The Palouse Country.

We left Corvallis, Montana, on Monday the 19th ult., at 7:30 a. m. to attend the session of the East Columbia at Palouse City, Washington. Our route was via. Missoula, Wallace, Tekoa, Spokane, but should have been by Spokane, direct from Missoula. We would thereby have saved 24 hours of time and hotel expenses, as the trains by the cut-off route do not make connections. In this case "the farthest way round is the nearest way through." We found all quiet at Wallace, business slowly reviving and our people anxiously awaiting the coming of a preacher whom the bishop had promised to send.

About ten miles out from Spokane, south, traveling either by the Northern Pacific or Union Pacific road, we come into an open, hilly prairie region covered with grain-fields and dotted with cottages and barns, and interspersed here and there with thriving villages and towns. It is known as the Palouse Country. The name is applied to all that section drained by the Palouse River and its tributaries. The Palouse heads in the Coeur d' Alene mountains. It flows in a winding course for nearly 150 miles, and drains the high rolling plateau almost to the very brink of Snake River into which it flows, after making a tumble of several hundred feet through a crevice in the volcanic rock that abounds here. The surface of the country is a succession of hills, knobs and ridges. As some one has said, you cannot call it a plain or a prairie, it is not level enough, neither does it roll. It just bulges up into hills of every imaginable shape and height from fifty to five hundred feet. The streams are sluggish, and are bordered in some places by cotton-wood groves. Now and then we find clumps of bushes and scattering pines along the hillsides. The soil is rich and productive, and the wheat and barley fields climb the steep slopes where you would think it impossible to handle a gang plow or drive one of the huge headers with which the grain is harvested.

The climate is pleasant and healthful, and possibly a little milder than in Montana. Fruit, such as apples, plums, pears, prunes, grows to great perfection, and we tasted some very fine peaches grown on the farm of an old friend, J. S. Randolph. Land is worth from thirty to fifty dollars per acre.

The country is intersected by various lines of railroad owned by both the N. P. and U. P. companies. There are numerous villages and towns which evidence considerable thrift, such as Tekoa. Rockford, Rosalia, Oakesdale, Garfield, Farrington, Pullman, Palouse.

Palouse City, where our conference was held, is sixty-eight miles south of Spokane, on the North Fork of Palouse River, near where it emerges from the mountains. It is not only surrounded by a rich farming country, but possesses extraordinary facilities for running logs down the river and has become noted for the extent of its lumber manufacture. It has an immense lumber mill, also one or more flouring mills, one of which has a capacity of fifty barrels a day. Palouse has a population of about 1500, boasts of a fine brick school-house and at least five or six neat churches, the best and most recently built, being that of the M. E. Church, South. There are two newspapers and numerous stores which seem to be doing a good business. The people are enterprising, liberal, well disposed toward Christianity and very hospitable. We greatly enjoyed our stay in the home of our old friends, Mr. and Mrs. M. W. Johnson, and were permitted also to share the hospitality of Brother Cruse and family and William Gray and family. There are many things that we have in mind to say about this wonderful country, but time and space at present forbid. We count it a pleasure and privilege to be counted worthy to assist in any way in establishing our holy Christianity among such a population and in such a rich, prosperous and promising region of country. This will do more than any thing else towards a peaceful solution of the great questions that are now engaging the attention of many of our people.

Hypercritical—not Hypocritical.

ERRATA. In our issue of the 30th of September, in the article headed "Rather Hypercritical," by some hook or crook the types unfortunately made us use the word "hypocritical." We are greatly pained at the occurrence, as such a word or even such a thought was not in our mind. We wrote "hypercritical," which has entirely a different meaning. In the same article we wrote, "We knew of a representative of a Presbyterian Church, but the types made us say "We knew of a representative Presbyterian church, etc. The reader will please note these corrections. We beg pardon of all concerned. It is not our purpose to be unkind.

OUR PULPIT.

Paul's Charge to Timothy.

SERMON BY REV. G. H. GIBBS.

Text 2 Tim. iv, 2—"Preach the word."

Let us notice briefly this young preacher to whom Paul is writing. Timothy was the son of a Christian Jewess and a Gentile father. His pious mother and grandmother taught him the scriptures from his youth. Paul says in his letter to him, "I thank God...when I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice." (2 Tim. 1, 3.) Again he says, "From a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." (2 Tim. iii, 15.) O! that all children could have such training. Timothy was converted when very young; and while yet but a youth, Paul chose him to be his companion in travel, and in the ministry. He proved a most faithful preacher and assistant to the great apostle. Paul, on his third missionary tour, left him at Ephesus, to superintend the church, and to put down false teaching which had arisen there. Paul wrote this epistle to Timothy while in prison at Rome. First, he tells him how to live. "Keep thyself pure." "Flee youthful lusts." A young man, especially a young minister, should be governed by judgement and not by desires. Paul tells him to "follow after righteousness, faith, love, peace," &c. He exhorts him not to covet riches, but having food and raiment to be content. "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful desires, which plunge men into destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil." He urges him to endure persecutions. "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecutions."

He exhorts Timothy to 'be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." Without this grace no man can successfully preach the gospel.

Paul tells Timothy what to preach. "Preach the word." This is what every minister should preach. God save us from what the world calls big preaching, and help us to get back into the old paths. Many preachers fall into the popular style of preaching to show to the world that they do not belong to the old fogies. Nothing hurts some people so much as to be charged with belonging to a past age. They want it said of them that they are up with the times. Progress is their rallying cry. Well, progress in the right direction and along well-approved paths is a good thing, and it is just what the church needs; but mere change is not progress. Progress lies in going forward where we are and pushing Christian work according to the ways which have been defined and sanctioned by God's word. The discontented, the restless, the adventurous, and the ambitious are pleased only with novelties. They cry: "Give us something new; we are tired of the old." They will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears. They turn away their ears from the truth and turn unto fables. But those who are sincere, who are seeking to know the truth, and want to know their duty, love to listen to the holy scriptures. We, as ministers of Christ, must "preach the word" whether it is popular or not. "Thou shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear." (Ezek ii, 7.) "He that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat?" (Jer. xxiii, 28.) We must live what we preach. "Be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity. Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them; for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear."

A minister must be an example of the believers in all things.

Dr. Bonar was right when he said, "Thou must be true thyself, if thou the truth wouldst teach; thy soul must overflow, if thou another soul wouldst reach." A man who would impart light to others must himself see the light. He who kindles a fire in other hearts must have it burning in his own. The ministers should not stand as a finger-post on a road where he neither leads or follows but he himself must feed in the elysion field of glory if he would lead his hearers there. Much of Peter's power at Pentecost in preaching repentance was due to the fact that he had himself repented. Paul's most effective sermon was the life he lived. What a responsibility it is to be a minister of the gospel. Indeed, we may well say; "Who is sufficient for these things?" One almost shrinks back from the responsibility; but we remember the curse of Meroz. "Curse ye Meroz," said the angel of the Lord; "curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof, because they came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty." (Judges v. 23.) Meroz was under the curse because she had both ability and opportunity, and was unfaithful. Paul says, "Woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel." When the servant of God understands his duty, he has great cause to feel his responsibility; but to me the greatest cause of feeling this, is a fact which not only concerns the ministry, but all mankind. The fact that God's eye is continually upon us. "Thou God seest me." "The eyes of the Lord run to and fro, throughout the whole earth." "The wheels of thy chariot are full of eyes." God sees everything we do; he sees our deeds, he sees our thoughts, he sees the very motives back of all that gave them birth, and what he sees he writes in a book: "And the book shall be opened." Oh! "who is sufficient for these things?" He alone who is "strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach the unsearchable riches of Christ." Ah, yes! this is the power that supports us. True, it is responsible, but then how glorious. Viewed in the light of eternity the church stands on a loftier elevation than the palace, and the pulpit offers a grander position than the throne. In point of honor there is no position beyond that of preaching the gospel. What a position it is! The book from which we read is inspired; the Jehovah of whom we speak, is God, the infinite one. The Christ in whose name we preach, is God incarnate in the flesh, and there is none other name given whereby men may be saved. Then let us preach the word of God faithfully.

East Columbia Conference Proceedings.

The East Columbia Conference of the M. E. Church, South, convened in the city of Palouse, Washington, Wednesday morning, September 21, 1892, and was opened at nine o'clock with religious services conducted by Bishop Duncan in the chair.

The members present during the session were: J. W. Compton, E. G. Michael, M. V. Howard, B.B. Swift, H. B. Terry, W. H. Hodges, J. H. Shelton, G. H. Gibbs, F. C. Adkins, Michael Larkin, Henry Barnhart, W. S. Hornbuckle, A. Y. Skee and F. F. St. Clair.

Lay delegates present: W. R. Winnifried, A. H. Crow, J. S. Phillips, Wm. Gray, E. P. Warren. There was also a good attendance of visitors present from various points of the country, some of them coming from quite a distance, even as far as Pendleton, Oregon, and there would have been many more had it not been right in the midst of the busy season for the farmers, when they were harvesting, threshing and marketing their grain.

The following committees were appointed:

District Conference Journals.—Bell, Hodges, Warren.

Publishing Interests.—Howard, Terry, Shelton, Compton, Gibbs.

Conference Relation.—Compton, Shelton, Michael, Adkins, Hodges, Larkin, Swift.

Public Worship.—Swift, Compton.

J. W. Compton, as usual, was chosen secretary, and H. B. Terry statistical secretary. A number of visiting ministers of the various denominations of the city and country were introduced. E. J. Stanley of Corvallis, Montana, and editor of the "Montana Methodist," was present during the entire session, except the first day.

Rev. Samuel E. Crow, son of one of the honored lay delegates present, and who has been attending school at Emory and Henry College for four years, was admitted on trial into the traveling connection. It was an event of more than ordinary interest, and at least one person present wept for very joy to see this young and promising son of the Northwest buckling on the armor and going forth to the battle. Rev. William Fancher, formerly a Baptist minister, but more recently of the M. E Church, was recognized as an elder and admitted into the Conference. Rev. H. T. Burger's health had failed, and he was located at his own request. Rev. R. G. Isbell's health had failed and he had removed to Alabama. He was located at his own request. Rev. R. B. Crego had failed in health and was discontinued at his own request. F. F. St. Clair was still suffering from nervous prostration, and was granted a supernumerary relation. D.W.Yoakum, C. C. Eagle were unable to attend the Conference on account of lack of funds. It would have required six hundred miles of travel for Eagle to come and return to his work. Surely this is a country of magnificent distances.

W. S. Hornbuckle, Henry Barnhart and W. H. Hodges were admitted into full connection. The Bishop's address upon the occasion was one of the best we ever heard. H B. Terry and E. P. Warren, the former a traveling, the latter a local preacher, were elected and ordained elders. W. S. Hornbuckle and Albert Anderson, the former a traveling preacher, the latter local, were elected and ordained deacons.

While there was not that degree of religious fervor that has characterized former sessions, yet the session was pleasant, harmonious and highly satisfactory.

The Bishop took ample time to hear reports from the field, and inquired carefully into every detail of the work. While a brother would now and then wince under the close and pointed questions from the chair, yet he was made to feel that it was not for his sake alone that the question was propounded and the word of exhortation given, but also for the good of his brethren and for the good of the entire church. Many practical hints were thrown out and useful lessons learned that will have no little helpful influence upon the labors both of preachers and lay members in the Conference in the years to come.

The sessions were well attended, and the congregations at the religious services were large and attentive. The Bishop preached on Thursday night and Sunday morning, and delivered one of the best addresses we ever heard at the Church Extension anniversary. The other services and anniversaries were conducted by the preachers present. The preaching that we heard was excellent. The lovefeast on Sunday morning, led by Brother Skee, was a time of great spiritual refreshing. The "dew drops," which had been falling plentifully all along during the session, now broke forth into plentiful "showers of blessing."

The following are the statistics reported: Local preachers 25, decrease 2; members 1,269, increase 15; additions by profession of faith 190, decrease 126; additions by certificate 112, decrease 102; removals 275, increase 170; infants baptized 65, increase 17; adults baptized 119, decrease 95; number of churches 22½, increase 6; value of churches $54,450, increase $14,100; parsonages 6, increase 3; value of parsonages $7,400, increase $1,250; other church property $8,559, increase $2,066; money expended for churches and parsonages $9,263, increase $5,855.

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

Number of Sunday schools 31; officers and teachers 213, an increase of 19; scholars 1,423, increase 32; amount collected for Sunday-schools $313, increase $64; raised in Sunday-schools for missions $46 25, increase $1:25.

FINANCIAL.

Amount paid presiding elders $775.50, increase $161.20; paid preachers in charge $5,478.10, increase $1609.15; paid bishops $44 55; conference claimants, $16.65; foreign missions $337.85, increase $54 71; domestic missions $705, increase $593.50; church extension $161.25, increase $43 00; expenses of delegates to general conference $17.30.

Conference Notes.

The sessions of the Conference were held in the elegant and commodious church building that has been erected at Palouse during the past year, under the efficient superintendency of Rev. J. W. Compton, aided by a noble company of workers true and tried. It is the best church in Palouse. The audience room is about 30x52 feet, besides a lecture and Sunday school room adjoining, which may be utilized by opening the folding doors. It will seat 250 persons, and was completely filled at the dedicatory services on Sunday. It was a source of great pleasure to this writer to be present on that occasion, for we know something of the labor and care incident to the erection of a new church building. The debt had nearly all been provided for beforehand, but a collection of thirty or forty dollars was taken to pay for the floor matting and a few other incidentals. We rejoice in the completion of every church building in this great Northwest, for it contributes just that much to moulding public sentiment in favor of truth and righteousness, and to hasten the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ among our increasing population.

The Church Extension anniversary a great success. The Bishop was in his happiest mood, swung clear and exposed the folly and absurdity of infidelity most effectually. The deficit, amounting to about $65, was raised in a few moments. We hope the brethren will make it a rule always to see that this collection is raised in full.

The Conference raised $705, of the $1000 assessed last year for domestic missions, though we were sorry to see the collections for foreign missions so much in arrears. It makes the heart bleed to see the demands made upon our ministry, to hear the calls that come up for their services and to see the financial straits into which they are brought by trying to answer these calls. We know of one man who had to sell his best horse to pay his store bill, and worked in the harvest field to get money to go to Conference. Another had to work on the ranch during the week and preach on Sundays, while others devised other means, the best they could, to keep them in the field. Several brethren were kept from attending Conference because they had not the money to pay their fare. This will never do. The work is bound to suffer under these conditions. This course compels men to become secular or retire from the work or seek other fields of labor. The strong (financially as well as otherwise) ought to help the weak. A great many of the people in this country who most appreciate the gospel are poor, improving and securing their homes when they hope to become more independent in the future. Would the Board were able at once to double its appropriations to these Western Conferences.

It was distressing to see the gap made in the itinerant ranks by the dropping out of four effective men at a time when they are so much needed. The scene was much like that when a small but determined army meets at roll call after a hard battle and takes note of the wounded and missing ones. There were many moist eyes as the impassionate petitions went up to the throne of grace in behalf of those who were retiring from the work, and to the Lord of the harvest for more laborers to be sent into the whitening fields.

Parsonage and Home Missions.

We rejoice to see the good ladies of the East Columbia Conference in taking such an interest in the Parsonage and Home Mission work. The anniversary of this society was held on Friday afternoon and was addressed by J. H. Shelton and E. J. Stanley. Brothers M. V. Howard and H. B. Terry are taking an active interest in the cause. The report showed 7 auxiliaries, 88 members, and $519.20 raised, most of which was for local purposes.

The following are the officers for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. H B. Terry, vice-president, Mrs. Gillis of Dayton, and Mrs. Thoroughman of Pendleton; corresponding and recording secretary, Mrs. M. V. Howard, Walla Walla; treasurer, Mrs. N. E. De Spain; district secretaries, Miss Mary Embree, of Pendleton District, and Miss Annie Williams of Rosalia, on Spokane District.

Visitors.

Among those in attendance at the Conference at Palouse who were not members of the body we noted the following: Mr. R. Hanger and wife, Mrs. Gillis and Mrs. Masters, of Dayton; A. L. Thoroughman and wife, of Pendleton; Rev. Albert Anderson and family; A. J. Vesse, of Rockford; H. M. Asbury and Mrs J. S. Hogue, of Moscow; M.C. Davis and wife, of Taney; J. W. Bicknell and others whose presence contributed much to the interest and enthusiasm of the occasion. It was the first session of an annual Conference that some of them had ever attended, and they were greatly interested and greatly refreshed by the proceedings. Would that it were possible for the great body of our people to attend these annual gatherings. They would better understand our polity and be much better fitted for the work they have to do, and would begin to realize that they have a work to do, and would feel more like performing it.

East Columbia Cavaliers.

Rev. F. C. Adkins, the converted cow-boy, is one of the growing men of the conference. He made a good financial report all except the salary of the preacher in charge. He was compelled to sell his best horse to pay his store bill and work in the harvest field to get money with which to go to conference. He has done a fine work at Weston, and we trust that his labors shall be greatly blessed of God at Pendleton.

Rev. P. M. Bell is not only a systematic and strong preacher, but has rendered efficient service in straightening up the records and systematizing the work in his charge. He was slightly ruffled over the exercise of episcopal authority in refusing him a transfer to the Old Dominion Conference, but submitted like an obedient son in the Gospel. Under the blessing of God, may the worthy lady soon to become his bride be able to modify that somewhat restive spirit and direct his acknowledged energy and ability to great usefulness in the days to come.

Rev. W. H. Hodges is a young man of acknowledged ability and is true to the Church. He has been faithful and diligent in his work, in the midst of difficulties. On account of the delicacy of his wife's health, he returned to South Carolina. Bro. and Sister Hodges won many hearts during their stay at Palouse, and all regretted to see them depart. We trust they will remember and pray for the success of their co laborers who remain on the outposts.

Rev. M. V. Howard improved the church-building, enlarged the parsonage, had a revival of religion, and did a good work generally at Walla Walla the past year. He is a good preacher, an active and successful worker—full of the Holy Spirit and of faith, and much people are added to the Lord under his ministry. He is one of the strong men of the conference and will make an excellent presiding elder. We rejoiced at the presence of his wife, two daughters and two promising sons, all of whom are earnest and active workers in the church.

When Howson B. Terry went to his charge two years ago there was not a member on it. Now he brings up a full report, one of the best made at conference, showing that he has been doing faithful work among a faithful and appreciative people. He reports a good membership and a new church-building completed and dedicated. He is one of the best statistical secretaries we have met. He has been greatly favored in securing the heart and hand of one of Kentucky's most accomplished and consecrated maidens, who is cordially welcomed to the Northwest, and will be greatly helpful in organizing and carrying forward the Parsonage and Home Mission work in the East Columbia Conference.

Rev. J. W. Compton is the acknowledged pioneer of the conference, especially of that portion included in the Spokane District which in its present condition is largely the outgrowth of his faith, his wise planning and self-denying and persevering effort. His labor at Palouse the past year has been crowned by the completion of the handsome edifice in which the conference held its sessions. He has the esteem of the people of his charge and stands as a tower of strength among his brethren in the conference. He is blessed with a faithful and consecrated companion and five affectionate children. Though pressed with both domestic and official duties, he appeared to be the happiest of all the members of the conference. He now finds ample compensation for the long lonely journeys over the trackless prairies of Esatern Washington in the days gone by. Ah, brother, this is only an earnest of what is to come, if we are faithful unto the end.

Rev. F. W. Robertson, a superannuated member of the Holston Conference, has been doing fine work as a supply on the Genesee charge, to which he has returned in the same relation. He reports that a good parsonage was in process of construction when he left the charge to come to Conference, and that it will soon be ready for occupancy. We trust that our brother's health will be greatly improved and that he may be abundantly useful while among us here in the Northwest.

D. W. Yoakum, who traveled the Burnt River circuit last year, is a self-made man; "made himself," as his presiding elder expressed it, "amid the mountains and valleys of the Northwest." He possesses acknowledged ability, and is successful in revival work. We do trust, that he may be provided for so as to give himself "entirely to the ministry of the word."

Rev. A. Y. Skee was once a disciple of Ingersoll, until at a meeting held by our ministers in Oregon, he saw the truth as it is revealed in the face of Jesus Christ. During the last year he traveled the Big Bend circuit which, he said, had been traveling westward, until it reached the town of Wilber, where it had stopped. By heroic effort he had built a neat little church, for the debt upon which he had become personally responsible. The circuit paid $35 to the member. Would have paid more, but the people were very poor. The crops were light the past year—only 3 to 7 bushels per acre, while the usual crop is 15 to 30 bushels per acre. As the country develops, the people will do better. Brother Skee is a strong preacher, a devout and faithful man, and is greatly loved by his brethren.

Rev. J. H. Shelton was transferred from the Missouri Conference last fall and stationed at Dayton, where he has done a fine work. His report was full in every item. A good parsonage had been erected during the year. He is a young man, full of zeal, greatly loved by his people, greatly pleased with his work and enthusiastic over the prospects for the growth of our Church here in this great Northwest. We welcome him and his noble wife to our band of workers.

Rev. F. F. St. Clair had some excellent revivals in the early part of the year, and has a church paper in about every home on his charge. The physician forbade his preaching any more for the present. He did not arrive at the conference till near its close, and his absence was noted by all the brethren who greatly lament his affliction. When in health he is a bundle of life and sunshine. He has recently found an helpmeet in the person of Miss — Priest, a handsome young lady of Davenport. We extend congratulations to the young couple and pray for the speedy restoration of our brother to his wonted health.

Rev. B. Swift, though feeble in body, is strong in intellect, in faith, in the Holy Spirit, in devotion to the cause of truth and righteousness and in the qualifications for the duties of a presiding elder, which he has discharged for two years past. Brother Swift is in great favor with both preachers and people.

Rev. E.G. Michael has just closed an eight years' term in the presiding eldership, and as station preacher will have an opportunity to become acquainted with his family. Compact in physique, he is solid and strong in his moral and religious make-up, and systematic and successful as a preacher of righteousness. He has twelve children and twenty-three grandchildren, all of whom, in time, we trust, will espouse the cause to which our brother and his heroic wife have devoted so many years of self-sacrificing labor. Brother Michael is one of the weighty men of the Northwest.

———

Rev. William Fancher, who has been a Baptist preacher, but more recently of the M. E. Church, has rendered efficient service the past year on the Summerville charge. He preached a strong and spiritual sermon at the conference and gives promise of efficient service in our itinerant ranks. May he have great success in his work at Weston this year.

———

W. S. Hornbuckle increases in strength as a preacher and in the influence of a consecrated and consistent life. He finds a hearty welcome this year among the people who have been under his charge before. Great success attend him.

———

Brother Gibbs has had a glorious year, many conversions, a beautiful new church built and dedicated to God. His report was almost full. His circuit is sixty miles in extent, and he was returned to carry forward the work so auspiciously begun. He will do good work anywhere.

———

Michael Larkin had to leave the parental roof, so severe were the parental strictures placed upon him when he was converted. His devotion to the cause he espoused in early life is now bearing fruit in the success that follows his labor. He is a born pioneer, and delights in going to "the regions beyond." and in hunting up and organizing the forces for the fray." He lays foundations for others to build upon, sows seed that are reaped in following years. There is no truer or more devoted man to our cause than he. God bless all such.

———

Brother C. E. Kirk is a modest young man, a good preacher, and has been successful in his work. He was unable to attend conference this year.

———

Brother C. C. Eagle has been doing pioneer work in the neighborhood of Boise City, Idaho. He is said to be quite efficient in revival meetings. He has had to depend upon his own labor partly for a living, and was unable to pay his way to conference. There are many people in the East and South who know nothing of what some of our western preachers undergo. They will pay the expenses of men to cross the ocean and return while our preachers cannot get to conference to pass their examination and be ordained, for lack of money to pay their fare. How long, O Lord, how long!

———

Rev. E. P. Warren, a local preacher and lay delegate from Spokane district, supplied the Rockford charge the past year. He is a good preacher and an earnest, efficient worker, and would be greatly successful as an itinerant if health and other circumstances permitted. His heart is greatly enlisted for the success of our Methodism in the Northwest.

———

Rev. Henry Barnhart, the "engineer" preacher, had an up-grade with a heavy load the past year, but he made the station and was admitted in good shape. He rejoices in the fact, that his own son is among the fruits gathered in this year. Many earnest prayers and good wishes will follow our brother and sister to their new field at Baker City.

———

Rev. S. E. Crow is one of the first of the young men reared in the Northwest and favored with the culture afforded by an eastern college, who has been called into the work of the ministry in this field. May the Lord keep him humble and spiritual, and greatly bless his labors at Camas Prairie this year. We shall expect to hear from him.

——o——

How we missed the hearty handshake, the fervent spirit and the glowing countenance of our old friend and brother, R. B. Crego. We could but drop a tear when told that the condition of his health was such as to necessitate his discontinuance. May the Lord deal bountifully and gently with him and those under his care, and may it be our happy lot to meet each one of this noble band of cavaliers on the sunny banks of sweet deliverance in the city of our God, when the warfare is over and the journey is ended. What a happy meeting that will be.

——

Rev. W. H. Howard, father of Rev. M. V. Howard, is a supernumerary member of the Columbia Conference. He was appointed to take the place of Rev. R. G. Isbell, whose health failed during the year at Pendleton. Owing to family affliction, his labors have been limited. He is an old timer on the Pacific coast, and has rendered more than twenty years of active service in the itinerant ranks in Oregon and California, besides giving a son who is one of the most efficient workers we have. He has many seals to his ministry. May the Lord be gracious unto him and his afflicted companion. We greatly enjoyed their hospitality at Pendleton.

Paragraphs from Bishop Duncan's Conference Talks.

A Methodist preacher can meet with no greater calamity than to have to serve a people who are without religion and without common sense.

——

I never in my life knew of a man who was on the fence, either political or religious, but that when he got down, it was on the wrong side. We want men who have positive convictions and are ready and willing to express them.

——

One of the most important problems for you to solve in this country, is how to get at the worldliness of the people and how to get it out of them. I find that in some places they have a prayer-meeting one Wednesday night and a hop on the next. They just alternate. These are alarming facts, and we must study and labor to correct them.

——

Would that we had enough men that we might unfrock a few Methodist preachers for neglect in making out their reports.

In his address to the class admitted into the Conference, the Bishop reminded the preachers that it was a most important step they were now taking. They were to be overseers of the flock. A few things are indispensable. A preacher must know his Bible, know his Lord and Master, must know men. He must have an intimate personal acquaintance with the Master, be as intimate and familiar with him as with a personal and very dear friend whose letters you preserve and read frequently. I rejoice that with advancing years I love the word of God more and more, have less use for other books only as they bear upon this one book. This is essential. You cannot do the Lord's work, cannot fight the good fight of faith without familiarity with "The sword of the Spirit."

Do not trust to mere feeling. When men say they feel so and so, I want to know what they believe to make them feel so. Too many of our people eat a good dinner, have comfortable surroundings, etc, and think they have a good case of religion. I knew a man once who took his toddy and under the influence of it thought he had religion. He kept on until it developed into a case of real drunkenness. Too many of our people are not genuinely converted. They don't know Jesus. Yes, they feel happy, say they love everybody, and all that. But you ask such a man for ten dollars to help build a church in Japan. All at once his countenance changes; he has a far-off look, very far, and gets very cold. His feeling is all gone and so is his religion—if he had any. What do you believe? What is your faith? What is the question? Read the New Testament most, but don't neglect the Old.

Remember you are to be fishers of men. It takes a fisher to catch fish, must know their habits, how to bait the hook, throw the line, and how to draw it in.

A man may be able to catch June bugs, but not fish. By accident he may cast a hook and catch one—a stray fellow who has never been out before; but to fish with any success, to any remunerative extent, to justify making it a business, he must know how. Study men! study men! Study their peculiarities. Be patient, be forbearing, be long-suffering. I have watched the great horse man, O'Rear, handle a vicious horse, fiery, savage, vicious, that would strike and bite and try to destroy him. He knew the animal, was patient and forbearing until at last the beast would lay down, or stand up and submit to every command. He knew the horse. My brethren, know men. Sometimes a preacher will assert his independence and declare that he is going to "run" things. This only excites resentment. If you find a man who is selfish or ambitious of leadership, study the man, make him your friend. Get close to him. Get the truth into his mind and heart, and after a while he will be suggesting the very things you desire, and will be saying, "oh, yes, Bro. So-and-so, our new preacher is a first-rate man, and I like him, but he couldn't turn a wheel until I joined in with him and helped him out." There is a way to "run" things without its being known, without appearing to do so. Study to find that way. Be long-suffering. Have the Spirit of your Lord and Master.

Be careful of your habits. I have seen groups of men walking about a hotel in a swaggering kind of way, talking, laughing, smoking, chewing tobacco, sitting upon the side-walk, clothes unbrushed and generally untidy. It was disgusting. If you want to smoke or chew, or stand on your head, it's none of my business. But it is my business whether you do these things in public, whether you make your person, the side-walk, or the room in which you stay unseating and unbearable to ladies. I have used some tobacco in my life, but very few people knew it. I never preached a sermon, nor wrote an article on the subject, nor told of my first cigar nor my last cigar, how I commenced or how I quit, and never expect to. This matter is with you. But be careful in your habits. Be models of pure and holy living, be examples unto the people in word and doctrine, in your daily life and conversation.

The East Columbia Conference is composed of as noble, earnest and brave men as are to be found in the Church. Strange to say, there is not an old man among them. They are young, strong, energetic, consecrated and confident. A large portion of their field is new, and capable of extension, almost indefinitely in every direction, and the brethren are determined by the help of God to extend it. From every side the cry comes to them, "Come over and help us". Bro. Skee reported a community of 3500 people without a preacher to visit their sick or bury their dead. They sent word to him "For God's sake come over and preach to us."

If possible, the brethren must receive more assistance from the general Board of Missions. They are crippled for lack of means, and cannot keep their men in the field at the present rate.

While there has not been a great increase in membership this year, there has been an increase in churches and parsonages. Substantial progress has been made. The preachers are united and determined. They are in the midst of a rich country, an increasing population, and a bright future awaits them if they are faithful.

Bishop Duncan captivated the hearts of both preachers and people during his stay among them. He has mingled with them freely dedicating churches, preaching and visiting from house to house. He is quick to understand the situation and ready to do all in his power to make the most of it. He is eminently practical in his preaching and his counsel. He understands the needs of the work here now better than ever before, and will not hesitate to use his influence to provide for it. His presidency in the conference was quite satisfactory, and his sermons extraordinary. He may rest assured that he will not be forgotten by the people of the Northwest.

——o——

The editor duly appreciates the great kindness and attention shown him by the brethren of the East Columbia Conference and the words of commendation spoken for the "Methodist." The paper will do all in its power to help them in their noble work. It was also a great pleasure to meet with our many friends at Palouse. Brothren Creize and family, Johnson and family, the Grays and others whose countenances and kind words are always refreshing.

Rather contrary to our expectations, this issue of the paper is made up while the editor is "on the wing," and this paragraph is written on board the train known as the "Overland Flyer" of the Union Pacific Railway, while we are "flying" westward at a rapid rate along the banks of the Columbia river between Pendleton and the Dalles, Oregon. This will account for the lack of variety, aside from conference news. We hope in the future to furnish our readers a more detailed account of our tour through the Palouse and Walla Walla Country, the Williamette Valley and to the great cities of Portland and Seattle. In the meantime let our friends make a special effort and send us large lists of subscribers. We hear many words of commendation for the paper. It has a bright future, and one of usefulness, if its friends will rally to its support.

Bishop Galloway's Address.

In 1861 the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, alone had 207,766 negro members. Those remaining with us at their own urgent request in 1869 were organized into the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, which has about 140,000 members. To-day, in the several branches of our one great family in the United States, there are more than 1,500,000 African Methodists. Never in all the history of missionary enterprise have such wonderful results followed the imperial sweep of the Apocalyptic angel. No wonder the Southern Bishops in exultant speech pronounced those Missions "the crowning glory of the Church." And such they will continue to be till the end of time. But with achievement comes increased responsibility. With the thousands of Christianized negroes in America we are in an eminent degree debtors to the Dark Continent. Our brothers in black can, and should be, efficient apostolic agents in the redemption of the land of their fathers. One of the ablest and most eloquent Bishops of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, an ardent friend of African Missions, thus spoke in a recent notable address: "God intends that this degraded race, which has been dwarfed through ages of heathenism, shall imbibe your civilization with your religion, and when sufficiently sobered through generations of self-possession, return to Africa, and bring its millions to Christ and heaven." I confess, Mr. President, when that blessed prospect opens before me, a vision of spiritual conquest stirs my soul into rapture. May we not hope that it is a heavenly vision unto which we should be joyfully obedient? There are many grave issues in the different sections of our growing nation, but as you may well imagine ours is what is popular known as the "race problem." The problem is the whole country's, but its greatest strain has necessarily fallen upon the South. We have felt the fierce after-glow of the terrible conflagration; others have moralized about it as on lookers, and some are liberally, earnestly aiding in adverting its calamities; but we have been at its storm-center and felt the sweep of its wildly contending currents. As early as 1782, Thomas Jefferson thus prophesies: "Nothing is more certainly written in the Book of Fate than these people who are to be free; nor is it less certain that the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same government." In the one instance the great statesman proved a prophet; in the other, by education and the open Bible, we are endeavoring to disappoint his somber prediction. This problem we must solve, if ever, not as partisans but patriots—not as critics of the past or sentimental theorists, but as true, broad-minded, liberty-loving citizens, invoking the guidance of Heaven and constrained by the loftiest conception of the brotherhood of man. This will require long patience and honest Christian patriotism. But I believe the Church and school—the Bible and the spelling book will solve this and every other social and political problem. (Hear, hear.) I part company with any man, however high in the councils of his country, who discounts the Church and the school as prime factors in every equation The strain of readjustment has been very great. There have been lamentable disturbances precipitated by well-meant efforts at our governmental and industrial reconstruction. These were to be expected, and could not well be avoided. That they have not been more frequent and fatal is due to the restraining influence of our Christian religion. These have in too many cases caused racial instinct to degenerate into antipathy, difference of the skin into prejudice of color, and pride of blood into political and personal hostility; but amid all, and above all, I can gladly say that the masses of the Southern people are generous, helpful friends of the negro, as they should be, for we have known him longest, we justly owe him most, and ought to love him best. (Applause.) One serious complication has been an unqualified suffrage. Our wisest men of all political faiths, I think, are now generally agreed that the sudden investment with the elective franchise of several millions of illiterate people—lawless with a strange sense of liberty, and totally ignorant of public affairs—was an experiment of infinite hazard. To the colored man the franchise became a frenzy, politics a passion, holding office a fetich, and loyalty "to party" a cardinal doctrine of religion. (Laughter,) On the other hand, these innocent suffragists have been made the football of parties, and the pitiful victims of shameless partisans. But I believe the storm has spent its fury, the clouds are drifting, and patches of pure sky are appearing. In the first place, the whole country is thoroughly committed to the intellectual training and elevation of the colored people. (Cheers.)

It is the settled policy of all the Southern States to provide the negroes with equal facilities to acquire an education at public expense. We have now 1,213,092 colored children in the State schools. In this beneficient work, our brethren of the North have liberally provided for institutions of higher grade, while the elementary schools are maintained by State taxation. Multiplied millions of dollars are thus freely given. But in all this we have not whereof to glory. Duty demanded more. In the second place, the negro is improving. And his progress has been great, though not uniform or universal. He is acquiring education, increasing in intelligence, accumulating property, developing character, and improving the ethics of his religion. In the State of Georgia alone the negroes own nearly 800,000 acres of land, and much other property, all valued at $12,000,000. Is not that progress? (Hear, hear.) I do not deny that some among us doubt the fact of any real improvement, and are skeptical as to the final outcome. Others, who take little account of time as a factor in developing a civilization or a race, become very impatient. And there are discouragements that sometimes dishearten. But I believe the tendency is upward and the future affluent with hope. I have studied with great interest your enlarged and enlarging educational policy, placing you well abreast with the highest modern culture, and am happy to report a like movement in our own land and in all branches of American Methodism. If you need a positive, essential faith as the basis of your national education, we the more. In a Government like ours, defined by the immortal Lincoln to be "a government of the people, for the people, and by the people," the very freedom of our political institutions and traditions is a concealed peril. It may beget a dangerous latitudinarianism in doctrine, a spirit of unrestraint, a lack of reverence for the forms and majesty of law, and a socialism that tends to anarchy. A safeguard we have found in our type of Christianity. I would not be chargeable with extravagance in saying that, but for the simplicity and purity for our Protestant faith—to which Methodism has so generously, magnificently contributed—our governmental experiment would have been a mournful failure James Madison, one of our Presidents, stated only a half-truth when he said, "A popular government, without popular information or the means of acquiring it, is but a prologue to a farce or tragedy, or perhaps both." Our need is not education, but right education—an education that is positively, potentially Christian—that develops character while imparting information, and magnifies the imperatives of its ethics above the dicta of philosophy or the discoveries of science. We want the education "that fits men not only for life, but for eternal life"—(hear, hear)—believing as we do that "without faith in the next world we shall lose interest in this." When Dr. Coke and Bishop Asbury determined to form an institution for the education of American youth, they issued a prospectus, which has this title: A Plan for Erecting a College, Intended to Advance Religion in America." And on that principle our educational system has been built, with our great Vanderbilt University as the center—of which I regret that time will not allow me to speak. I readily admit, as one of your own eloquent ministers has happily phrased it, that "God has not staked his all on Methodism." But though the Methodist spirit and movement have not exhausted the resources of Omnipotence, it has been in the Western world his mightiest expression of spiritual and saving power. It has not, possibly, produced the deep and wide "ethical revolution" it should, but its influence has been wonderful and abiding. It is not a spent force as a revival. (Hear, hear.) With us, as in the days of Asbury, Methodism is a divine antagonism to sin—an eternal protest against the reign of evil—a sanctified impatience for the contest if the nations—an organizer, "Go into all the world." It is the Church of all classes—of the highways and hedges. "The Protestant Propaganda—a perpetual reconnaissance in force." In theology, while adhering strongly to the doctrines so clearly stated by Wesley, so valiantly defended by Fletcher, and so ably elaborated into a logical, consistent system by Richard Watson, we yet give hospitality to the accepted results of critical and philosophical investigation.

Notes

—For several issues past we have devoted our space largely to reports of the western and northwestern conferences. Now that the sessions are ended we shall endeavor to furnish our readers with a greater variety of interesting matter.

—Bishop Duncan remarked to some friends that this year he had sent this scribe home to get acquainted with his wife and children. Well, we have just returned from a visit of nearly four weeks in Oregon and Washington, and find a pressing call to go in another direction. So much for the staying at home part of the programme. It does not look much like staying at home when we are to fill the columns and foot the bills of a paper such as we are striving to make the MONTANA METHODIST.

—Please renew your subscription just as soon as convenient, and try and forward another name with a dollar. The love that you have for the cause of Christianity here in the northwest will surely prompt you to do that much.

—A fifteen carat sapphire was recently picked up in our State, which when cut down proved to be most valuable.

—An express train on the Union Pacific road, 32 miles east of Pendleton, Oregon, was recently saved from a fearful wreck by a tramp. A huge mass of loose rock had slid down on the track on the hillside where the road-bed is built on a shelf cut out of the rock. It was discovered by the tramp who built a fire and waved a fire-brand as a signal to the train that came thundering along at the rate of 45 miles an hour. The engine was brought to a standstill just as it struck the rock pile, and doubtless many lives were saved. The poorest and most despised of the children of men, by faithful and prompt use of the opportunities that come to them may become greatly useful and helpful to their race.

—Two large steamers recently collided on Puget Sound. The collier "Williamette" ran into the large passenger "Premier." A number of lives were lost. It was in a dense fog. How many are the perils of those who go down to the sea in ships. Not as numerous, nor so great, however, as those that beset every mariner sailing over the sea of life where ten thousand foes arise to draw us from the skies where we are tossed by every wind of doctrine, and the great adversary is using all his cunning devises to befog the minds of his victims that he may overcome them and drown them in perdition. Be sure that you ever have on board that hope which is an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil whither Jesus, the forerunner, has for us entered.

—An effort is on foot in Portland, Oregon, to set aside Mount Hood and the country around its base as a National Park. This is well. But with all the grandeur of Mount Hood, which is considered the pride of Oregon, yet it can never begin to vie with the Yellowstone National Park in the scenes of natural beauty and grandeur which it offers to the traveler.

—A recent canvass of the State of Oregon, estimates its population at 386, 877, an increase of nearly 40,000 since the census of 1890.

—A grand celebration in honor of the discovery of America by Columbus was begun in New York City on Monday, the 10th inst. The city was in gala attire. Broadway was festooned and arched from Castle Garden to Harlem. Twenty-five thousand school-children marched in procession while the sidewalks were crowded with enthusiastic spectators.

—Hon. Robert Lincoln, American minister to England, was honored with an invitation to act as pall-bearer at Poet Tennyson's funeral. Being unable to accept, his place was filled by Mr. Henry White, secretary of the American legation. The Tennyson family expressed a wish that America should be represented at the funeral.

Columbia Conference Proceedings.

The Columbia Conference of the M. E. Church, South, met in its twenty seventh annual session at Albany, Oregon, on Wednesday, October 5, 1892, at 9 o'clock a. m, and was spent with the usual devotional exercises, conducted by Bishop W. W. Duncan in the chair, followed by the administration of the Lord's Supper.

In the absence of the former secretary, D. C. McFarland called the roll. There were present during the session, clerical: D. C. McFarland, R. C. Oglesby, J. W. Craig, T. P. Haynes, W. J. Fenton, W. L. Molloy, J. W. Shreve, P. A. Moses, R A. Reagan, H. S. Shangle, H. B Swofford, J. F. Wallace, J. L. Futrell, T. Thomas, J. W. Parker, J.W. May, J. M Turner, J. B. Parnall, M. O. Ligon, C. U. Cross.

Lay delegates present: J. A. McGhee, F. S. Doughton, Geo. T. Burkhart, S. J. Wilhoit, Michael Dean, William Ledgerwood. There were six out of the eight lay delegates present, and we know of one, a brother Day, who was kept from coming by a very great affliction in his family—the death of a son.

P. A. Moses was chosen secretary, with Reagan and Shangle for assistants.

The usual committees were appointed, the boards filled up, and the Conference put in working trim.

Drs. E. K. Miller, of the Missouri Conference; H. M. Dubose, editor Pacific Methodist Advocate, San Francisco; F. C. Heitzler, agent American Bible Society for the Northwest; Rev. E. J. Stanley, of the Montana Conference, and editor of "Montana Methodist," and a number of pastors from neighboring churches were introduced.

The Conference resolved to meet at 9 o'clock a. m., and adjourne at 12 m. The afternoons and evenings were devoted to committee work and public worship.

Most of the time, after the first day, was devoted to receiving reports from the charges. The Bishop was very careful to inquire into all the details of the work. His counsels and exhortations, suggested from time to time by these reports, fairly bristled with points and were highly interesting and helpful, not only to the preachers, but also to the large number of visitors present at the Conference.

The past year had been a very trying one in several respects. The crops were light, times very dull, and the preachers were very meagerly supported. If most of the preachers had not received assistance from private sources, in addition to their salaries, they could not have kept in the field. It is a mystery how the average Methodist minister gets along. But he generally gets through some way, no matter how little he has received, goes to Conference fairly well dressed, with a cheerful, hopeful spirit, makes the best report he can under the circumstances, and reports for duty next year. There had been some revivals, and several churches and parsonages built, but not sufficient to make up for the losses from removals and from pruning the church rolls and reducing the force down to a real positive working basis. The Conference has some real heroic spirits in the 'old guard' who have done a grand work by their fidelity to our cause in times that tried men's souls, and it has received a fresh infusion of good blood by transfers, among whom are some men who will be greatly useful to the church there if faithful to the charge committed to them.

J. W. May and J. M. Turner were admitted on trial into the traveling connection. G. S. Hanleiter was discontinued. C U. Cross and W. J. Fenton were ordained deacons. Lewis A. Fenton, a supernumerary, had died in great peace during the year. He was a young man, unmarried, good and true, deeply pious. His last words were, "It will soon be rest, oh, how glorious!" It is surely an honor to die with the armor on in such a field, in such a cause. We covet no higher than this.

A pleasant episode was the presentation to the bishop, by the Conference, a mallet made of myrtle wood, a native growth in Oregon. Brother Reagan, who made the speech, referred humorously to the fact that he was appointed last year to "cane" the bishop, and now it became his duty to "maul the presiding officer. The bishop said that fortunately he had never found it necessary to use a gavel, but if at any time in the future it became necessary he would take great pleasure in using the one presented by the brethren of the Columbia Conference.

The following are the statistics: Members 1,201, decrease 104; local preachers 10, decrease 4; churches 27, value $29,292; parsonages 11, value $7,500; expended on churches and parsonages $9,603.88; adult baptisms 40; infant baptisms 14; Sunday-schools 29; officers and teachers 186; scholars 1,022; money contributed by Sunday-schools $166 98; assessed for foreign missions $521.40, paid $153.85; assessed for domestic missions, $422 15; paid $100 95; church extension, paid $39 55; education paid $12.65; paid for Bible cause $3.25; collected at church extension anniversary $135, in addition to what had been paid on the pastoral charges. There had been assessed for the two presiding elders, total $548.60, and paid on the same $395 68; assessed for preachers in charge $4,475; paid $2,566 88; paid bishop's fund $30.47; other objects $115.56.

The next conference will be held at Myrtle Creek.

Resolutions.

1st. That we extend the brethren and friends who have so hospitably entertained us during the session of our conference, our sincere thanks, praying the blessings of God upon them, their homes, and their city. Signed by H. B. Swofford, R. C. Oglesby, M. O. Ligon, H. S. Shangle.

2nd. That we hereby express our hearty appreciation of the presence and services of our beloved Bishop Duncan, and also of Dr. H. M. Dubose, Revs. E. J. Stanley and E. K. Miller; and if in the providence of God they shall find it possible to visit any of our conference sessions in the future we shall greet them with joy. Signed by H. S Shangle, W.L. Molloy, R. C. Oglesby, H. B. Swofford.

Church Extension.

The secretary of the Church Extension board gives the following figures:

Amount received from the charges $52.15; raised at anniversary collection $133.65; total $185.80; about $25 above the assessment. There were applications to the conference board for aid from nine charges, aggregating $4,400.

Mrs. J. L. Futrell was elected President of the Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission Society; Mrs. James Jenks, corresponding secretary and Mrs. Cobb, recording secretary; Mrs. H. S. Shangle retains her office as its efficient treasurer. The chuch extension anniversary was a grand success. Dr. Dubose made a brilliant address and was followed by the Bishop in his own peculiar style. The audience will not soon forget the train of cars alluded to by the first speaker and elaborated and dwelt upon at some length by the second. He assured them that the Columbia Conference people were not on the "train" and could not hope to get on until the amount of the deficit was raised. They seemed to accept it as true, paid over the money in a short time, and all rejoiced.

Report of the Board of Missions.

A Macedonian Cry.

The question of the necessities of our work was discussed, and our longing, yearning desire for more men and means was often alluded to. The large opportunity for us at Portland and the Puget Sound country seem to hold up its hands as a Macedonian crying to us to come and help.

Then, Southeas ern Oregon, we know is a fine and promising field. Some of us have recently been through there and have heard the real, literal yearning of the people for our church. Klamath and Lake counties—yea, all that eastern tier of counties—are almost literally destitute of any preaching by anybody. Now is the day of our opportunity. Oh, that we could enter at once with a good force. But where is the means and where are the men? We are sure the men can be found. Oh, that the Lord would put it into the hearts of people with money—much or little—to furnish that. [These counties referred to, we are told, contain each a population ranging from seven to ten thousand, and many of them are substantial men. Surely this is a strong and urgent call. Would that the Church would hear and heed, and above all, be stir herself and answer it.—Editor]

Columbia Conference Notes.

Our joy at meeting with the brethren of the Columbia Conference was not entirely unlike that of the African explorer upon reaching the settlements and meeting with friends near the coast after his long and perilous march through the wilderness and down the Congo. For twenty-three years we had been working our way westward, helping, as best we could, to extend, establish and strengthen the lines of our beloved Zion, from Missouri, across the prairies of Kansas into Colorado, through the valleys and amid the mountains of Montana, Idaho and Washington. We had met with brethren beloved and enjoyed seasons of refreshing, as we heard the good news that came to us of the work along the coast, but we confess to an intenser delight than ever when we entered the Conference room and were surrounded with preachers and almost overwhelmed by the greetings of those who are working where the waves of the Pacific wash the shore, and whose self-sacrificing labors are dotting the western coast with parsonages and churches.

The editor dully appreciates the cordial welcome extended him personally and the kind words of commendation spoken by the committee for the "Montana Methodist." Nearly all the preachers, and a goodly number of the laymen, gave us there names for the paper. Space is being annihilated; the lines are drawing closer together. Already we begin to feel the thrill of a stronger faith and hope imparted by this closer touch of hand and heart with our brethren "beyond the mountains." God is in the movement. May He sanctify all these means to our growth in grace and to the greater growth and extension of His Kingdom throughout our broad land.

The hospitality of the people of Albany seems to be unbounded, judging from the royal manner in which we were entertained in the elegant home of Hon. J. K. Weatherford and wife. Every possible want was anticipated and every luxury provided that are fined and generous hospitality could suggest. Added to all this was a pressing invitation to "come again, stay longer, and bring with us the better half of the houshold." Our stay in that home of intelligence and refinement will be long remembered.

What a privilege to meet with Dr. Dubose, editor of the "Pacific Methodist Advocate," whom, though not having seen, we had learned to love. He is of medium stature, stout-build, with dark hair and mustache, a full, bright eye, a sunny face, and has a rather rapid utterance. He is brainy, brilliant, cultivated, classic, clean cut, captivating. A single dash at his editorials and sketches and they are finished ready for the printer. His sermons and addresses show close thought and careful preparation. He held his large audience in breathless silence at the M. E. Church on Sunday morning while he related in his own unique style the "love story of the universe," suggested from a passage taken from the Song of Solomon. We gave him a pressing invitation to visit the Montana Conference which he hopes to do at our annual session next fall. Our people will rejoice to see and hear him.

We were most delightfully surprised at seeing our friend, Dr. E. K Miller, one of the presiding elders of the Mission Conference, at Albany. He has relatives as well as hosts of friends in Oregon who were delighted to see his face and listen once more to his message of love. He preached an excellent sermon on Wednesday night. There were many present who had known him in California where he labored many years, and some who were his parishioners during the years of his young manhood in Mo.

The religious services of the conference were largely attended by devout and interested hearers. Not a few people came scores of miles to enjoy the conference services. The climax was reached at the conference love feast on Sunday morning when there was such an outburst of religious fervor as we have not witnessed before for many days. A brother remarked that it was a real Pentecost. Surely they were all of one accord and one mind, while preachers, laymen, men, women and children, talked, shook hands, wept and shouted the praise of God together. It was good to be there.

The days of heroism are not yet past. Men would not endure what many of our preachers in this conference (and their noble wives) are enduring if they did not have within them the stuff that heroes are made of. The idea of a man and wife and family of from three to six children living on a salary of from two hundred to four or five hundred dollars (oftener the less amount) is astonishing. We all know where it will lead to if there is not a change. Preachers are forced to become secular and thus neglect their legitimate work, or to abandon the field. The time has come for a change. The people must rally with greater liberality to the support of the work, and the church at home must also make greater appropriations than heretofore. We cannot longer be silent to those Macedonian calls and remain guiltless.

At Albany we met with a venerable Christian lady, Mrs. J. E. Carter, a widow in the full sense of the word, according to the "Pauline standard" as given in First Timothy, fifth chapter, ninth and tenth verses. She was a member of the church on the same circuit with our parents and attended a camp-meeting at Fire Branch camp-ground, near Knoxville, Mo., in '54 or '55, where Clanton sang and Dockery and others preached with mighty power. Her home, near Denver, Colorado, was "a shelter in time of storm," for Baxter and Stateler in bygone years, where the latter was stopping when his house was burned in Kansas. Her home was also a stopping place for him on his trips to and from Virginia City, where he was going then to preach during the severe winter weather in '64 and '65. She and her family accompanied Stateler and his wife on that long journey they made to Oregon, an account of which was recently published in these columns. She is a genuine mother in Israel, zealous for the success of the armies of Israel and is working and waiting with a well-grounded hope of everlasting life. Who can tell how much the prayers and entreaties of such faithful and consecrated mothers has contributed to the maintenance and success of our cause in the great West?

Missionaries! Missionaries! Missionaries! They seem to be everywhere. Bishop Marvin, we believe, once said that he found them all around the world. We have found them in force in Kan., Col., Montana, Idaho, Washington, and now we have come upon perfect colonies of them in this great Willamette valley in Oregon. To say that there are worse people in the world, is putting it entirely too mild. On the other hand, while there may be some exceptions, yet we are glad to find them well represented in the class who constitute the bone and sinew of the country where they live. The Methodist pioneers, such as Monroe, Caples, Marvin, Stateler, Green, Redman, Patton, McAnally, Leeper, Rush, Berryman, Vandeventer, Devlin, Dockery and hosts of others, preached a pure gospel among them which took hold of their lives and is now bringing forth its fruit in the churches and conferences that have been planted in these mountains and broad valleys of the West. May our labors as ministers be as productive among the people to whom we minister in this Northwest, in the years to come, as others have been.

Columbia Characters.

Rev. D. C. McFarland is one of the strong men of the conference, physically, intellectually and spiritually. He is a Missourian by birth, but was on the Coast in time to enter the Columbia Conference at the time of its organization. He leads the singing, talks but little on the floor, though what he says is to the point, is zealous for the character and welfare of the church he loves, and wields a strong and wholesome influence throughout his district, where he has served as P. E. and P. C these many years. "May his bow abide in strength for years to come."

Rev. R. C. Oglesby was converted at a C. P. camp-meeting in Putnam County, Mo.; came to Oregon in '53; joined the M. E. Church, South, in 1861, and entered the traveling connection at the first session of the Columbia Conference, in 1866. He has never missed a roll-call nor a religious service in the Conference since its organization; has been presiding elder 11 years of the time. In company with Compton and Mays he organized the work in Pendleton District. He had the honor of accompanying Bishop Marvin much of the time when he was in Oregon. He loves the church, works and prays for her prosperity, and will have a bright crown when his work is done.

J. W. Craig, though almost bald, is quite brainy (nothing unusual, you know), and is modest and unpretensious in manner. He is an Arkansan by birth, but came to Oregon in '52, joined our church in '61, united with the Conference in '66, in the same class with McFarland and Oglesby. He was for three years presiding elder of Oregon District, which then embraced all the State occupied by us, his district numbering from 18 to 21 appointments. He was in California awhile, and now transfers to East Columbia Conference. He has seen hard service, which is now telling upon his health.

Rev. R. A. Reagan came from the Tennessee Conference in 1890, and took the plan of Brother Leach who went to China. He has been a member of the Tennessee Conference for 30 years and is noted for his striking resemblance to Bishop Haygood. His wife is a relative of the lamented J. B. McFerrin, and his daughter, who was sent to China five years ago by the Woman's Board, is now married to Rev. C. B. Moreley, P. E., of Matsuyama District, Japan. Another daughter married the son of Rev. T. J. Duncan of Tennessee. He is both well related and well regulated.

Rev. W. J. Fenton was born in Crawford County, Mo., in '65, converted in '82, began preaching in '87, came to Oregon in '90. Was a school teacher. When his brother died he took his place as a supply on the Coquilla Circuit, joined the Conference one year ago. He is a young man of good gifts and will succeed.

Rev. W. L. Molloy came from Kentucky, where he was born in 1832, just 60 years ago. He was sent to Oregon in '87 by Bishop Hargrove and has been in the regular work ever since. Having gotten out of the traveling connection under peculiar circumstances, after he was 56 years old he re-entered de novo, passed the course of study and regained his former standing. He was happily married about one year ago to Mrs. Amy May, a devout Christian lady, and is happy on the way. Bro. Molloy succeeded in erecting a neat church building at Teasel Creek last year which was dedicated by Bishop Duncan just before Conference.

Rev. T. Thomas was born in Shropshire, England, 1846; came to America in '68; converted in Minnesota in '73. He has been a traveling minister 8 years, and came to us from the Wesleyan Methodist Church. He came to Oregon in '90 and united with the conference one year ago. Served the Tangent Station, where he received a fairly good support from the people. He is an excellent preacher.

Rev. H. S. Shaugle came from the Southwest Mo. Conference about two years ago; was stationed at Albany, where he made many friends, and was compelled to take a supernumerary relation at the last conference. He is well balanced, consecrated, a good preacher; a systematic worker, and we doubt not will make himself felt for good throughout his district this year. Success attend him.

Rev. C. U. Cross has done service and has a most interesting history. He is a young man, though married, and worked as a captain in the Salvation Army for about five years. Had his nose broken once by a young rough while engaged in street work in Albany, Oregon. (The young man who did it was converted next morning.) His health failed; he retired, grew cold, attended a Southern Methodist meeting, was genuinely converted, began preaching, and is more and more pleased with our church. He is bright, sunny-faced, and spiritual. May the Lord give him great success this year.

Rev. T. P. Haynes was born in Kentucky, became a preacher in Tennessee, and came from that conference to Oregon in 1874. Was presiding elder of Rosebury for the past two years. He is talkative and rather humorous on the conference floor, of a cheerful temperament, and is a good strong preacher. His family is heavy for district work in the Northwest the present financial depression.

Rev. J. B. Parnall was born and raised in England, became a preacher in the Bible Christian Church, and on coming to America he united with the M. E. Church, South, uniting after a while with the Missouri Conference, where he labored for five or six years, after which he came at the earnest call of the church to Montana four years ago, serving the Stevensville charge, one of the leading appointments in the Conference, the entire time. Thinking that a residence nearer the sea coast would be conducive to his health, and furnish him greater strength and vitality for the Master's work, he transferred to the Columbia Conference. He is one of the best preachers, deeply pious, consecrated, zealous, systematic and successful in building up the Church. He leaves hosts of friends in Montana who greatly regret his departure. We bespeak kindly treatment for him and his excellent wife, and we know they will have it.

Rev. M. O. Ligon is a native of South Carolina and graduated at Wofford college under the presidency of J. H. Carlisle, who he regards as one of the greatest men in the world. He is of good Methodist stock, traveled some before leaving the South; he came to Oregon two years ago, was stationed at Corvallis, where he is doing fine work. He is a young man of fine spirit, is deservedly popular, and will be heard from in the future, if life and health are spared.

Rev. C. G. Harmon is a young man from South Carolina, and has been stationed the past year at Albany where he married in April. He has built a nice parsonage, is deservedly popular, and there was an urgent plea for his return. Brother H. increased his popularity in the conference by the excellent entertainment he provided for members and visitors.

Rev. P. A. Moses is a Virginian by birth and education, a graduate of Randolph and Macon college, under the presidency of Dr. William A. Smith, with the second honor in his class. He was president of Whitman college, Ark., for four years, and left that to come here. He is seventy-four years old, has had many ups and downs, yet he is young in spirit, active, full of energy, zealous for the success of the Church of which he is an honored and useful minister.

Rev, J. L. Futrell came from the Indian Mission Conference, where he had some experience in newspaper work as one of the proprietors of "Our Brother in Red," the organ of that Conference. He has a pleasing address, is enthusiastic for the success of our Methodism in the Pacific Northwest, and will do his part towards its achievement.

Rev. J. M. Parker came to us from the Protestant Methodist Church a year ago. He is a zealous worker, remarkably successful in paying off old church or parsonage debts, and enthusiastic in the advocacy of a higher life for Methodist people.

Rev. J. W. Shreve is a Virginian by birth and raising. We first met him at the East Columbia Conference two years ago. He spent part of the following year in the "Old Dominion," and when he returned, he transferred to the Columbia Conference two years ago. He is a man of good sense, faithful and true to the Church, an earnest worker and familiar with the hardships of a western cavalier.

Rev. J. F. Wallace, though a young man, is an old timer on the coast, was engaged in secular business until recently, entered the Conference one year ago and served the Linkville circuit, which is 50 miles in extent. He is tall, strongly built, sunny faced, a great rustler, and succeeded in building a parsonage, doing the work with his own hands. He traveled 350 miles, bringing his noble young wife with him, in his own conveyance, to get to Conference. He will succeed.

Rev. J. M. Turner who was admitted on trial, had served as a supply for two years and had proven faithful and efficient in his work.

Rev. J. W. May, also admitted on trial, is a native Oregonian, a good man, without reproach, loyal to the Church, and with pluck sufficient to go to school and secure a fair education, even after he was married.

Rev. H. F. Dennis is a local preacher of good report. He has served the church in various relations as exhorter and local preacher for 40 years. He has raised a large family of children, one of whom is the wife of Rev. F. Adkins, of the East Columbia Conference. He has traveled as a supply on various charges, just taking for his services what the people were disposed to give. His faithful wife was recently called from his side to her home on high, and he is rejoicing at the prospect of a meeting again when the warfare is finished.

Rev. B. R. Baxter is a local preacher in this Conference He was licensed to preach in Missouri in 1844, and entered the traveling connection at once. Was ordained deacon by Bishop Paine in '46, elder by Bishop Andrew in '48, and transferred that fall to Indian Mission Conference, then back to Missouri in '52. In '63 he left Missouri, and went to Nebraska City. Made one or two trips to Denver, and in '65 went with a freight train—ox teams—to Virginia City, then to Helena, Montana, arriving about the 1st of January, '66. For two years he preached, and superintended a Sunday-school in Helena, living on a ranch on Ten Mile Creek. In '68 he moved his family to Oregon, traveling by way of the old Mullan road, which the party had to clear of logs and fallen trees. He settled in the Williamette valley. He has been in the regular work only about five years since that time, serving as college agent, station preacher and presiding elder. The demands of a large family, and the limited support furnished by the Church compelled a location, since which time he has been preaching here and there, as time and strength permitted, "on his own hook." He says he is still for the M. E. Church, South, first, last and all the time. His heart and sympathy are still with the ministry, but he is resigned to the lot that has fallen to him. The gospel that he once preached with such acceptability and power sustains and cheers him in his advancing years. His hair and beard are silvered, his voice slightly tremulous, but his form is still erect; his features strong and placid, and his eyes fixed upon the mark and prize above.

We had crossed his path so many times in Missouri and Montana, and had heard so many kind words spoken of him and his ministry during the days when men's souls were tried, that we felt it a great privilege to look into his face, shake his hand, hear from his own lips the accounts of his labors, and receive his blessing. May the Master deal gently with this venerable man of God in his old age.

It was surely a great joy to us to meet such noble laymen as J. A. McGhee, F. S. Doughton, George Burkhart, S. J. Wilhoit, Michael Dean, William Sedgerwood, A. Cauthorn, Woods, Bryan, Montanya, Cundiff, Householder, Jenks, and others too numerous to mention. Most of them came here when this was a wilderness and have helped to make it rejoice and blossom as the rose. They have stood by the preachers and have been and are still, pillars in the church of God. It was an inspiration to hear them sing and pray and talk and shout the praise of God, as not a few of them did at the love feast on Sunday morning. With such interest in and devotion to the work of the church as one witnessed among the laymen (the good women—the "elect ladies"—of whom there are not a few, included) there can be no doubt about the future of our church in the Northwest.

Notes From the Field.

Dear METHODIST:

I must keep the promise I made, to write frequently for your columns this year. Deer Lodge, the place I call my home now, is a delightful little city—with or without the capital. From here I attended my first quarterly meeting at Townsend the first week in September. Bro. Lee had just returned from the Flathead country, his former charge, and had hardly gotten started with his work. He had rented a house in town and was prepared to move in soon. The occasion, all taken together, was pleasant and profitable to us all.

The Conference ordered the disposal of the old "Duck Creek" church or its conversion into a house for the preacher. If it can be moved into town and cut up into rooms, it will make a fair parsonage and save the the P. C. $150 rent. We now hope this very thing is being done. Several friends of the church offered to help in work. I think it can be accomplished with $200 cash.

Bro. Britt moves off well at Deer Lodge—had a pleasant Q. conference session with him and his excellent people in midweek.

The sale of the Anaconda church property had been effected by this board of trustees during the quarter for $4,000. The Conference Board of Church Extension, was given the distribution of this fund for church and parsonage building in the conference.

Bro. Wagenner met me at the train in his new buggy at Stevensville, and for the first time I began to feel the honor of being presiding elder. His people saw he was a big man and that he must have something to eat, and they agreed to give him $900 as P. C. for the year. He will certainly keep up appearances on that and the appropriation made. He distributed the P. E. quite liberally around the work, delivering me Monday evening, at Hamilton to Bro. Flowers who drove me behind his excellent preacher's nag up to Grantsdale, where on Monday night we held his quarterly conference with hopeful outlook and returned via. "ye editor's" home (in your absence) to join in the closing scenes of a fishing-day, at Bro. Flower's home. Bro. McAlister of the M. E. church, the fisherman of that section, had come up with Bro. Wagenner and Father Wagenner, and before Brother Flowers and I got there had caught very many fishes — a bucket full of these, together with a sack of apples, a paper of plumbs, a jar of strawberries and some rolls of butter made my family more glad than usual to see me come home.

Willow Creek is one of the oldest places in the conference, and it was the good old style way in which they met and received the new P. E.

"Father Stateler" was present at every service and added much to the interest and profit of the occasion—much to my own enjoyment of it.

Good congregations, rapt attention and hearty responses to all the exercies were features most enjoyable of the meeting.

We tried to give a point to the meeting along the line of enlarging the parsonage which, as it now stands, is too small for any kind of a family.

J. W. Kemper, of Butte, who seemed determined to have a hand in every good enterprise in the land, had handed me $25.00 to help them build and this added to what was in hand, and others that we received amounted to about $220.00 in cash, and quite an amount of work.

The building committee which had been appointed by the Q. Conference Saturday evening met by appointment Monday at 9 a. m. and determined to build a double room house, a story and one-half high, which being joined to the present building will make a good six-room house for the preacher there.

This gives us a home for each of our preachers on the field, a statement that could not be made in many of our conferences.

At Butte we were met by brother Alton, our new pastor there, who had arrived on Saturday and had preached Sunday to a large and delighted audience. Bro. Alton is 24 years old, six feet high, weighs 200 lbs.; is dark complected, no beard, and a single man. (Ye Montana maidens take notice.)

The Q. Conference at Butte was held Monday evening, and was a pleasant session, well attended.

The people seemed to be in fine spirits, and are looking for great development in our work there during the year.

We need a large and commodious church house, this year at that place.

On Tuesday, Ruth Lee and I hurried home (bringing Bro. Alton down with us) to be present, and bring presents, to Eugenia, who that day was celebrating her sixth birthbay.

I mention here the very serious sickness of my relative. Bro. Wm. Hensley an old resident of this country, known to many of your readers.

With his pastor an a few more invited friends we administered the Holy Communion to him yesterday at four 4 p. m. My own and only brother who came to us for his health seems greatly improved.

My work calls me to Retgrade & Bozeman to-morrow and will write of those points later on.

I now expect to give to Boulder the 23 of Oct. the time announced for Great Falls, and go to that place later when I can tell them definitely about a supply for them.

Bro. Britt beg meeting here Oct. 16, with Bro. Alton helping him. I hope all of the brethren may soon do likewise.

Plan for great things, work and pray for them and then expect them. Begin at once and help each other and the Lord will help you all, and save men through—this is—your mission, and commission.

J. E SQUIRES, P. E.

Dear METHODIST:— I have been in Tennessee ten days, and think I have seen enough during that time to give material for a letter. Without loss or accident we made our trip from Deer Lodge Montana, to Murfreesboro, Tennessee, in four days, a distance of 2,036 miles by the railroad tables. The letter written from Deer Lodge announcing the time of our departure, was twenty-four hours late, so we took the family by surprise—anticipating their expectations a few days. It was a happy day for us all. Six years have elapsed since seeing home. We found the home folks all very well, and we were also as well as usual, with the exception of our baby girl, somewhat indisposed from stale fruit on the train. The pastor of our church in Murfreesboro, Rev. A. P. McFerrin, was in the midst of a revival meeting when we arrived. He had his brother, Rev. J. P. McFerrin of Macon, Ga., assisting him. These men are nephews of the well known Dr. J. G. McFerrin, and have something of the same kind of metal—neither so original, nevertheless, gifted, able ministers and so recognized by their respective conferences. I enjoyed the meeting three nights and two days before its close. The prayer and praise service at 8 o'clock a. m. was largely attended and very enjoyable, and at night, the church with a capacity of about 1,000, was comfortably filled. A number of conversions and accessions rewarded the labors.

Last Saturday I attended a quarterly meeting on Stone River Circuit, a work of four appointments, lying out six to ten miles from the city. This Conference was held at Bethel—a well known church, made historic by such men as Fountain E. Pitts, A. L. P. Green, J. B. McFerrin, Thos. L. Moody and others of less fame.

The Pastor, Rev. Fain, and Presiding Elder, Rev. T. L. Moody, Jr., were met at 11 a. m. Saturday, by nine stewards and one local preacher for official work, and a good congregation, all for preaching at this hour. It was my happy privilege to preach for the P. E. After service we had dinner on the ground and after dinner the business of the Conference. I was greatly interested in seeing end hearing an "Eastern" man preside over such a body. My decision was that he knew his business. No complications arose under the head of Miscellaneous Business, which he could not pilot through to safe landing. There was one very intricate matter under this head too. In the report of the pastor I learned that there were 431 members, 4 Sunday-schools, 150 scholars. Assessment for P. C. $700; for P. E. $87.50; for Foreign Missions near $200; Home Missions $42; Church Extension, $42.50, etc. It was thought an easy matter to bring up the amount yet due for Ministerial Support, and for all the annual Conference collections except for Foreign Missions. These assessments seemed to me very large in proportion to Ministerial Support. Just see this Circuit, for P. C. $700; for Foreign Missions about $200, half what the whole Montana Conference was assessed last year by the General Board.

Bishop Fitzgerald came up from Atlanta, Ga., last week and preached Sunday, at 11 a. m., what to me was new, the "Matriculation Sermon" of of Soule Female College, of this city. He was just out from an attack of illness, and though very feeble, gave us a good discourse on Psalm 119:100. "I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts." The burden of sermon was to magnify the moral element in education, and the Bible as the source of true wisdom.

Sunday eveing at 7:30 the writer stood before the largest congregation we had met since two years ago in the same pulpit. It was with some trepidation that I should be called upon to preach the concluding sermon of such a high day in Methodist circles in this church ranking with the Nashville churches next to McKendree.

I found God just as good to me as elsewhere, and that I could preach with the same liberty that I did with Bro. Warren on Shield's River, Oak County, Montana, the day we organized the first church in that region.

I have received a very hearty welcome by five or six of the preachers of this, the Tenn. Conference. Bro. Moody, presiding elder of Murfreesboro Dist., informs me that such has been the draw on Tenn. for the work West, that men for the better class of charges are greatly needed. Our friend, Dr. J. A. Orman, P. E. of Nashville District, was up from Nashville a few days since. It was pleasant to meet him. He is a good friend of the West. I hope by the next time I write you I may have my appointment, among the other good men of the Tenn. Conference.

I shall be busy three weeks of the time filling engagements with Presiding Elder Moody, and assisting in revival work. Allow me through the dear MONTANA METHODIST to wave back words of love for my brethren at the front, whose fellowship I am now willing to forget. The Lord bless them and their families and flocks. May I also add, that the tie shall ne'er be broken, between the dear brethren of the laity whose faithfulness and kindness I remember with refreshing gratitude. The Lord be with us till we meet again. Mrs. Couey joins me in these last words. Murfreesboro, Tenn.,

Yours Truly,
A. C. COUEY.

Deer Lodge Notes.

We begin the year hopefully and with most pleasant surroundings. Bro. Tabor, my predecessor, who was also my successor, did good work in Deer Lodge. Much advance on all lines has been made since I left here two years ago.

As an instance and proof of the unselfishness of Methodist preachers, I want to mention Bro. Tabor's generosity in regard to the parsonage here. Our old parsonage was small and far from the church. Bro. Tabor bought a house and lot joining the church and well suited for a parsonage for $1,000. The price of property advanced so that the house and lot were easily worth $1,500, but when the Church sold the old parsonage and wanted to purchase a better one, Bro. T. sold them his place for the same that he gave for it, thus virtually giving the Church $500.

I was over at Helena last week to see about publishing the minutes of the last Annual Conference. After consulting with several of the brethren, Bro. Warren and I concluded that the benefit of having them published was not worth the cost. So the minutes will not be published this year.

Our ladies gave a dinner in the Court House Yard here on Labor Day, Sept. 5. They cleared $128, which was devoted to paying church

Dear METHODIST:—We receive the METHODIST and read it with pleasure and profit; we only wish it came weekly.

We enjoyed a short visit from the editor, Rev. C. J. Stanley, on his way to Conference, and regret that his stay with us is "always limited."

Our Presiding Elder, Rev. Swift, is with us and expects to preach for us next Sunday. Our Pastor, Rev W. H. Hodges preached, in the power of the Spirit, his farewell sermon Sunday, from John 1:29. A good collection was taken up and a general hand-shaking followed, as he and his wife left last Tuesday for their former home in South Carolina. Bro. Hodges will long be remembered here among his people and "May the blessings of God go with them, and great success attend them whereever they go."

We have no minister now, but are keeping up all our other services until we are supplied. Our Church door is open for some one to enter in, and we feel much good to be done. The work in the West requires much toil, care and consecration, and self sacrifice; but we, as a Church, are willing to hold out our hands to help, strengthen and encourage who ever is sent to us, and may our earnest prayers help, and efforts be felt, our Christian lives "lived," and we know we will be supplied and our prayers answered. The precious promises, "All things work together for good to them that love God," and "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end," are two that we should all have for our daily guide and Comforter

Mrs. P. M. Daniels, accompanied by her daughter, Kittie, and eldest son Leroy, left Tuesday for Chicago, when they will meet Mr. P. M. Daniels. Leroy will be greatly missed in our Church and Sunday-school, as he contemplates remaining for several months.

Our Sunday-school is doing good work under the faithful and efficient Superintendency of Mr. Fred Daniels. Mr. Daniels lives 8 miles in the country and is always in time, very prompt, and ready. Would that we had more like him. We have an average attendance of about 40, with earnest Christian workers for teachers and officers.

They have also organized a Mission School, with 38 pulpils and Geo. E Dyer as Superintendent.

The Epworth League met last Wednesday night and elected the following officers for the ensuing year: C. W. Dyer, Pres.; Mrs. E. L. Davies, Vice Pres.; Mrs. May Dyer, Second Vice Pres.; Mr. T. A. Frans, Sec.; Mr. W. H. Krider, for Literary Work." It is hoped the League will meet with great success the coming year.

Miss Duffy, one of our members, is visiting friends in San Francisco. With "good cheer" to the METHODIST I remain,

AN OBSERVER.

Bishop Galloway's Address.

(Concluded.)

But while, as to its spirit and doctrines, the Church is reverent and orthodox, I pray we may be delivered from a mere hereditary Methodism, living on traditions, sitting among the tombs, and out of sympathy with the great movements of thought and life so characteristic of this electric age. (Applause.) Ecclesiastically, Methodism in the South is conservatively progressive. (Laughter.) We honor the methods of our fathers, but make no fetich of ecclesiastical polity. While cautious of change, what is needful to adapt our great machinery to the imperial demand of the times, we adopt, recognizing the fact that

The world advances, and in time outgrows
The laws that in our father's days were best.

We have introduced lay delegation—giving laymen equal representation in the General Conference. The pastoral term has been extended to four years. And in many other respects there has been response to the exigencies of the age, but without in the least disturbing the constitutional principles of Itinerancy and General Superintendency. On the temperance question Southern Methodism occupies a foremost position, insisting upon total abstinence for the individual and absolute legal prohibition by the state. Our own 5,000 preachers, with scarcely an exception, are total abstainers, and our General Conference has spoken with tremendous emphasis in favor of the legal suppression of the infamous traffic. (Applause.) For the integrity and purity of our national Sabbath, which is becoming an ominous question, we earnestly contend, believing that on the authority of the word of God, and the sanctity of the day of God, the perpetuity of the Church and the prosperity of the nation mainly depends. There is a general movement among all Christian denominations in America to get into closer fraternal fellowship and co-operation. Divisions are deprecated, and a more perfect unification of the followers of Christ everywhere desired and demanded. I believe we have a wider vision and a loftier conception of the divine mission of the Church Universal. The days of interdenominational strife have well-nigh passed away. Ephraim and Judah have ceased their vexing. The ecclesiastical warrior has been disarmed and dismissed the service. (Laughter.) The polemic has become a pastor and the proselyter either a pitiful anachronism or a mournful memory. (Laughter.) Weightier matters now press upon the conscience of the Church, and a warmer love constrains her energies and accelerates her imperial conquests. Differences are recognized and respected, but not, as in other years, allowed to obstruct the larger movements of the Holy Spirit. As respects the members of the great Methodist family, one in doctrine and only slightly variant in polity, there is a growing spirit of brotherly love—a sincere desire for a more positive Christian Unity. Negotiations are now pending between the several branches of African Episcopal Methodism, that promise at an early day, not only unity, but union. And the two largest members of our household, I am persuaded, have entered into a better understanding, a higher appreciation, and a heartier sympathy. Leaving the question of organic union to the leadings of Providence and the logic of event—not to be hastened or retarded, not to be courted or rejected—there is sincere response in the South to the unanimously adopted resolution in the Ecumenical Conference at Washington in favor of Methodist Federation. (Hear, hear.) We ought to avoid the haste and waste of rival Methodist altars—the race to reach a village and preempt the ground, a sort of ecclesiastical "squatter sovereignty"—(laughter)—or, which is worse, to undermine and disintegrate the Methodism already planted. And this spirit of Federation grows. Despite some adverse surface indications, I believe the masses of our people, under the blessings of the Lord and Life of this Church, will bury "the hatchet of ecclesiastical strife," and by the royal law of love prohibit in future its manufacture or sale. (Laughter.) And now, Mr. President, I have too long trespassed upon your great kindness, but my reception has been so cordial, and your courtesies so hearty and brotherly, that I haves been encouraged thus to effectively offend. (Laughter.) Our hope is that these fraternal deputations shall be continued, not as mere formalities, but as expressive of the kinship and Methodistic unity which shall bind us closer together with the growing years. Be assured that our door will open at your coming, and that you will find homes in our hearts and honors at our hands. And thus may we help each other to keep in line with

The eternal step of progress,

Until this world shall be redeemed by the Son of man. I pray the divinest blessings upon your deliberation and that the work here done will forever be—

Not unapplauded in the Book of Heaven.

Thoughts for Christians.

The love of God is the mainspring of Christian action.

A testifying church is a soul-winning church.

Stagnant pools can be purified by stirring;so can a backslidden church.

If there were but one soul to save it would be a work worthy of men and angels to go forth to save it.

There are no non-missionary Christian churches, nor are there any non-missionary Christians.

Adversity is no evidence of the divine displeasure. Job lost all, but his hold on God and his personal integrity.

EDITORIAL.

LITILE THINGS.

Do not neglect the little things,the little courtesies, the ordinary duties in the routine of every day life,while vainly waiting to perform some great and notable deed. Life is made up of littles. The ocean is an aggregation of little drops of water, and the and, of tiny pebbles. The tallest trees come from small acorns and the great rivers are formed by the myriads of little streamlets that start on sunny heights, trickle down the mountain sides and course their way for countless leagues through dark and dismal canyons, where they are lashed into fury and seldom see the light of the sun.

The greatest results often follow efforts that were regarded as commonplace at the time. After all, it is difficult to decide which are the small things, the little duties—indeed, we believe there are none such—in a consecrated life. Even those members of the body, says the apostle, which seem to be most feeble,are necessary, and those members which we think to be less honorable, upon these we bestow more abundant honor. "We are the body of Christ and members in particular." With a complete consecration to God, and possessed by the Holy Spirit, every word we utter, every step we take, every thought, desire, emotion, every twinkle of the eye or expression of the countenance, is fraught with eternal interests. Nothing is trifling, nothing little or common-place. How truthfully the Master says, "He that is faithful in that which is least"—appears to us to be of the least importance--"shall be counted faithful in that which is greatest." It will be observed that the men whom we are wont to regard as greatest in this world are those who are faithful in "little things"—who give careful attention to details, and vice versa.

Do not complain of monotony. Take a lesson from the old mill-wheel. Viewed from one standpoint there is nothing half so dull or prosy. Round and round, over and over, it goes. The same old movement. No diversion. No change, day in and day out, week after week, year after year. It makes you tired to look at it even for an hour. But go inside and see the powerful and complicated machinery in motion,the vast quantities of golden grain that it is grinding, the thousands of robust men and women and happy-faced rollicking children that are fed by the breadstuffs it produces, and it loses all its monotony. So with every one that is in the line of duty.Somebody is being sustained, comforted and encouraged by your effort. We look at the things that are seen—the earthly side of the picture. The veil is upon our minds. But there is another side, a brighter and better. Erelong the veil shall be taken away, and we shall see as we are seen and know as we are known. Some of the most beautiful characters that we have ever known were people of humble circumstances and surroundings, possibly bowed with infirmities, with age and feebleness extreme. But though poor and feeble in body, they were rich in faith, in peace, in joy and hope and love. Their faces are photographed indelibly in our mind. The memory of their cheerful words, their pleasant smiles, their hearty handshakes and earnest God-bless yous and their noble deeds, their patience and forbearance,linger about us as a sweet aroma and afford an inspiration. They never tried to be great—in the common sense of that term—they never even professed to be "perfect," and in a large measure were unconscious of the influence they were exerting, the work they were doing. But they were as near perfect as any people we ever knew.

The man who made the rope with which the great apostle was let down in a basket over the Damascus wall never dreamed of the use that would be made of his work. But he was honest and faithful in his line of things, made a good rope which stood the test and in the hands of men (none of whose names are given us, but who were true and faithful to duty), and under the blessing of God, saved a life and furnished an apostle to go far hence unto the Gentiles and preach the Gospel to many nations.

Then take courage brother, cheer up sister. God is no respecter of persons, and the present is no exception to the rule in His way of working and blessing.

We, of this generation, are in the midst of crises where fidelity to duty may be as far-reaching in its influence for good, as when the keeper of Jethro's flocks answered God's call from the bush that burned with fire; when Jesse's son was anointed king of Israel; when a few poor but faithful men who had "toiled all the night and taken nothing," left their fishing nets and went forth to be 'fishers of men;" or when the toiling tent-maker was sent forth to be the great apostle to the Gentiles. The "one pound" when diligently and faithfully used will grow to "ten pounds" and bring a meetness for the "ten cities," or if "buried in a napkin" will carry with it the curse of the King and the loss of all, the same in 1892, as when the Lord uttered that wonderful parable. Then, why stand idle? Go into the vineyard and labor, and whatsoever thy hands find to do, do it with thy might. Be content with thy lot, for in due season ye shall reap if ye faint not.

—o—

HOMELY HINTS.

Have you prayed for your preacher and his work this week, brother? If not, do so at once, and you will be surprised at your increase of interest in and love for both preacher and work. Pray for him and you will hear him gladly. He will be a blessing to you, and you a blessing to him.

TAKE THE METHODIST!

How much have you paid for pastoral support this year? If for the remainder of the Conference year you pay no more than you have paid in the months that are already gone, will your pastor be able to live? Pay all you can, and pay it early.

Has a minister of the M.E.Church, South, in Montana, ever preached a political sermon, or made a political speech? We think not. Can as much be said of some of the ministers of some other churches? "By their fruits ye shall know them.

Don't forget the MONTANA METHODIST. It is a CAPITAL paper.

"Too many churches at Stevensville," we were told the other day. Well,the Southern Methodist Church had the first Protestant organization and built the first Protestant Church there, and is to day the strongest church in the valley. Our skirts are clean. Altar against altar we did not set up.

—o—

Faith, though weak, is still faith—a glimmering taper, if not a glowing torch; but the taper may give light as truly as the torch, though not so brightly.

Here and There.

Let us be careful not to exercise undue haste in abandoning interests that have been secured by sacrifice and toil in localities simply because the outlook is not the most promising at the present time. This country is yet in the infancy of its development. We know not what changes a day may bring forth. It is impossible to tell where the great centers will be. It was just this hasty action that cost our people in Denver, Colorado, a church building and a position of influence, which it has required a quarter of a century of hard labor, and the expenditure of many thousands of dollars to regain. We are personally known to instances not a few where we were almost ready to abandon all hope, but where by holding on our cause to-day is strong and prosperous.

In a single issue of a paper devoted especially to the advocacy of the doctrines of entire sanctification there were more than a dozen captions, references to the opposition of the church papers to the holiness movement. A close inspection of the columns of half a dozen of the leading church papers at hand, revealed not a paragraph or a line that indicated the least animosity, or even opposition of the character mentioned. While we should magnify the grace of God, it is well not to enlarge upon the errors and oppositions of brethren beloved. Let us be careful that the doctrine of perfect love be not brought into disfavor by the exhibition of an unlovable spirit upon the part of those who discuss it.

The dedication of the World's Fair at Chicago, on the 21st ult., was a grand affair. The governors of many states, together with many prominent men of this nation, the representatives of nearly, or quite, 50 other nations that are to take part in the great Exposition,were present.Bishop Fowler, a Methodist bishop, and Cardinal Gibbons, a Catholic, offered prayer. While Henry Watterson and Chauncey M. Depew were the principal orators.

There were 200,000 people under one roof, and 5,500 persons in the choir. It is said that prices paid for accommodations were on the same gigantic scale: $22 a day for a hack to the fair ground; $5 a day for an ordinary room at the hotel, and $50 were charged and paid for the use of a window over looking the procession for three hours.

Deep and wide spread sympathy has been felt for President Harrison, in the death of Mrs. Harrison, which occurred at the White House on Tuesday morning, the 25th of October. The protracted illness and death of this good lady has doubtless done much toward softening the temper of leading political opponents during the recent campaign.

Our former official relation to the Anaconda church property prompts us to say that, personally, we were opposed to the sale, both as to the time and the proposed disbursement of the proceeds thereof. We do not doubt the legality of the proceeding. But we make no claim to infallibility in judgment, shall bow in submission to the powers that be, and try to pray that all may be over-ruled for the glory of God and the advancement of His cause.

Arrangements are being made for holding the first inter-national Epworth League Convention in Cleveland, Ohio, some time in July, 1893. It will likely be the largest and most important meeting ever held in the interest of the young people of Methodism throughout the world, and will give the movement a mighty and world-wide impetus.

"Our Dumb Animals" is the title of a nice little paper published at Boston, Mass., devoted to the prevention of cruelty to animals. It ought to have a wide circulation. It is doing a fine work, and there is much that needs to be done along this line.

We have had a delightful autumn in Montana. While the yield of grain, fruit and vegetables was not so large as in former years, yet the quality is fine. We have seen apples here that are scarcely excelled anywhere, either in size or quality, surpassing the average of what we saw at the exposition at Portland. Several potatoes were brought in from our own garden that weighed from four to seven pounds each.

Notes from the Field.

—Rev. Tom. W. Alton, our new pastor at Butte, writes that everything is moving off nicely there. Our brother understands the situation and is equal to it. He has made a fine impression, we learn, and we wish him the fullest measure of success in that busy bustling metropolis.

—Rev. S. B. Tabor writes: "Our work in Bozeman is moving off very nicely. Congregations are steadily increasing. The Sunday-school also is having a steady growth. I have visited 30 families to date; have been received very kindly by the people that I have visited. There is a wide and inviting field in Bozeman, and I am very hopeful of a good year's work." We rejoice at this encouraging note from our brother. He is one of our most valued and effective men, and we predict for him a successful year in that important and inviting field for our church.

—Rev. W. T. Goulder writes from Willow Creek: "We start off well in our new work. I tkink both preacher and people are pleased. We can speak for the preacher, and the people show their appreciation."

The people have determined to improve the parsonage at Willow Creek by the addition of two or three new rooms, which will make it one of coziest preacher's homes in the Conference. Necessity seems to be the mother of invention, to some extent, in the matter of parsonage building. When the preacher who is married, or who is about to be, becomes possessed with the idea that he must have a house to live in he is sure to inspire others with the same belief, and when both preacher and people are of the same opinion the ways and means are sure to be provided.

—At this writing, Rev. W. O. Waggener is engaged in a promising protracted meeting at Fair Play school-house (near Woodside). Congregations are increasing, and there have been several conversions and one reclamation. The pastor has set his mark at two hundred conversions this year, is pressing unto it and confidently expecting to reach it. There was one addition to the church at the last regular service at Corvallis. The attendance is increasing and the interests of the work looking up at every point on the charge.

—By some oversight we notice that in the list of appointments of the Montana Conference, East Helena and the name of R. H. Shaeffer were omitted, while the name of L. Bramble appears as station preacher at Helena. It should read: "Helena Station, R. H. Shaeffer; East Helena, L. Bramble."

—Rev. J. E. Squires, who is here and there and everywhere nowadays, since his wife's health, we are happy to say, is so much improved, recently visited Corvallis and Stevensville. He is full of plans for the enlargement of the work, and reports the outlook encouraging.

—The presiding elder met with a cordial reception at Wallace, where he had a fine hearing and a delightful time. Prof. ———, late of Iowa and principal of the public school, has been appointed superintendent of the Sunday-school which is rapidily growing in interest and in numbers. We do trust that the right man will be found for this important place, and that right early.

—From Private sources we learn that Bro. Britt is moving along nicely at Deer Lodge, that congregations are improving and the outlook is promising.

—Rev. J. R. Waggener is rendering efficient service on the Stevensville charge by his sermons, songs and fervent supplications.

—Miss Maggie Evans, the Corresponding Secretary of the Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission Society for the Montana Conference says, "The society is requested to observe the Friday before Thanksgiving as a day of fasting and prayer, the subject—that Christ may reign in our land.

—Rev. A. C. Couey requests that his paper be sent to McMinnville, Tenn. He says: "We had a grand, religious, spiritual Annual Conference at Tulip Street Church, Nashville, Tenn. The sum totum of money raised for Misssions, Church Extension, Education, etc., during the session approximated ten thousand dollars. There were some unexpected changes made in the conference appointments. I have been assigned to a very nice station in Murfreesboro District. We are all well.

Good Cheer for the "Methodist."

—Mrs. S. R. Campbell, who is a niece of Rev. Daniel A. Leeper, of blessed memory in the Missouri Conference, and who has been one of the faithful members of our church in Montana for more than twenty-one years, writes that she "cannot do without the 'Methodist.'" They have a school-house and a Sunday School in the new community where they live, in Rosse's Hole. We appreciate the pressing invitation to visit and preach for the people there. We remember well a trip to that region many years ago when every member of our little party was equipped with needle, gun and a well filled cartridge belt. We literally "camped on the trail" with the dry hard ground for a bed and the starry canopy for a covering, not knowing the moment when we would be met by hostile Indians. The country was new and wild. How delightful it would be to go now upon a different mission with the "weapons that are not carnal" and spend among the brave and prosperous settlers about Sula.

—Mrs. S. A. Riley, of Boulder, Montana, writes: I do not want to do without the precious "Montana Methodist."

—Mattie E. Keith, Slater, Mo.: "I am glad to see the work and paper so prosperous in Montana. I pray for the work there every day. I am a lifetime subscriber to the 'Montana Methodist.' Enclosed find $1 for it."

—Mrs. Austin, an old Virginian, now living Bozeman, sends two dollars and adds: "The 'Methodist' is a welcome visitor in our family, and I am always pleased to receive it."

—Mrs. Mary Farris, Maryville, Mo.: "Find one dollar for the 'Methdist.' I can't get along without it. I love the western work. It seems like home to me. I get so much news from my friends through the paper. We have a new preacher, and like him very much.

—Our Church Extension Secretary declares that the "Methodist" gives him more trouble than and other paper he takes—when he gets it he can't do anything else until he reads it through. Advertisements and all. Another brother, a farmer, declares that he has to quit work when the "Methodist" comes, until he reads everything in it.

Moral: If correspondents and business men want to be sure of having their articles and advertisements read (by several thousand people) publish them in the "Methodist."

—Rev. A. J. Notestine writes from Kickapoo, Kansas: "I am pleased with your paper. May God bless you in your work. I am on Kickapoo circuit this year. Am just beginning a meeting here. Brother Corner is to help me. We are expecting this to be one of the best years in the history of the Western Conference.

—Rev. Henry Stanley writes from Circleville, Kansas: "The 'Montana Methodist' is one of the best little papers in all the land. Its visits are looked forward to with much interest. Our people are having a pretty hard time of it. Crops were very short—not more than one-third the usual crop, on an average—caused by the cold, wet spring followed by the dry and hot summer. It continues dry and hot—has not rained for over a month. The winter wheat is dying for want of rain. The dry hot winds came up from the south and blew for several days and destroyed much of the wheat that was just coming up."

Poor Kansas! Between the floods, drouths, cold and hot winds, grasshoppers, chinchbugs and cyclones, she has a hard time. Why do not our friends come to Montana, where we have good land, good water, good crops, pure air and plenty of it, and where a cyclone was never known?

—A friend in Mo. writes: Through the kindness of Brother H. B. Bell, of Stevensville, we have been receiving the "Montana Methodist" for one year. We like the paper very much and want it all the time. Enclosed find one dollar.

—Bro. William Beall, a ranchman in moderate circumstances, sends us five dollars for the missionary debt and five dollars for the "Montana Methodist" which is to be sent to his friends. How many will follow the example of these two brethren. It would not only help us out financially, but would do much to increase the interest in our western work and help to strengthen and extend it. We have on our list many substantial names that were secured by some friend first sending the paper gratis for a while. Please don't neglect this. Send us several names with the money, right away, before you forget it.

Married.

Mr. William D. Logan and Mrs. Ella Vaughn of Grantsdale, were united in marriage by Rev. E. J. Stanley at his residence near Corvallis, Montana, October 18th, 1892.

The happy couple showed their good taste by subscribing for the MONTANA METHODIST.

We wish them a happy and prosperous voyage together over the sea of life and a safe landing "on the evergreen shore."

At the church in Rosalia, September 15th, by Rev. W. S. Hornbuckle, Rev. F. F. St Clair, of the East Columbia Conference, and Miss Anna Priest, of Lincoln County, Wash.

The bride is the daughter of Bro. William Priest, and is highly esteemed for her many excellent qualities. The groom is well known to the readers of the METHODIST by the many stirring articles he has contributed to its columns in the past. Success to the happy couple all through life. H.

[The above notice came just after our departure on our trip to Washington and Oregon. Hence the delay in its appearance.—Editor]

About Our Paper.

For some time past there has been a strong desire upon the part of not a few persons to have the METHODIST printed nearer home. This desire arises from the present delay in bringing out the paper, and also on account of inacuracies in the print that it is almost impossible to prevent when the editor cannot read his own proof. We are not indifferent to these things. We appreciate the situation, and have gone to the trouble of interviewing, either in person or by letter, publishers in Spokane, Stevensville, Missoula, Helena, Bozeman, Kansas City and Nashville (Tenn.), to try and find out the best terms for getting our paper printed in a creditable manner and at a price within our reach. The result was made known to our Board of Publication during the Conference at Bozeman, where the matter was fully convassed. As a result, the Board recommended the continuation of the paper under the present arrangement, authorizing its change to a weekly, at the discretion of the business manager.

Almost unanimously, the Conference, after full discussion, adopted this report. Negotiations were at once begun looking to the carrying out of the plan of changing to a weekly. But during our absence from the state the matter was again discussed by the brethren, and a strong pressure brought to bear to have the paper published at Bozeman. But another canvass by those present, with facts and figures before them, convinced even our progressive presiding elder that the plan recommended by the Conference is the best. We think that our paper published under the present auspices, is better than a periodical with a big debt hanging over it and far better than no paper. A weekly paper is in general demand, and will be more easily sustained than a semi-monthly published under almost any circumstances. This will prevent the delay of much of the "copy" in the office before sending to the printer, and will add much to its freshness.

So if arrrangements now on foot do not miscarry, by the first of December we hope to change the "Montana Methodist" from a semi-monthly to a weekly paper, with the present size, and the price remaining as it is, one dollar a year. Let every lover of our cause in the Northwest feel congratulated over this arrangement. Our paper is already in favor with the people at home and abroad. This should increase its acceptability and its usefulness as an agent in diffusing a knowledge of our holy religion, of what we are doing to advance it, and also in strengthening our cause throughout this great Northwest. The new plan will devolve much extra work upon the editor, with no extra pay save the hope of increased usefulness. Our friends must help us out. There will be more space for reports and the preachers will need to write oftener; more room and greater need for subscribers, and all hands, preachers and laymen, young and old, will please assist in sending them in. Let there be a forward movement all along the line.

E. J. Stanley,
Business Manager.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Fron St. Joseph, Mo.

The time has again come for renewal of my subscription to the dear "Montana Methodist." I really think my love for the little paper, (little in one sense only) is stronger than for all the other church papers; for oh, what a struggle our dear church has had, and where can we find greater heroes than our handful of Christian men who have offered unto God the sacrifice of life-long, patient endurance? Through love-divine they will at last obtain white robes and conquering palms.

I find great comfort in the thought that God has patience with me—that I can pray to Him with faith for light in darkness, strength in piteous weakness; and I desire that I may be enabled to climb the ladder of duty and be like Him who is the Rock of Salvation. May God in mercy give showers, copious showers of the Holy Spirit to all my brethren in Montana, and may our church become famous for Holy Ghost religion.

In Christian Love,
MRS. M. R. COX.

——o——

From Coquille, Oregon.

Editor of "The Montana Methodist:"—After more than six weeks of varied experiences, spent in travel, sight-seeing, resting and recreating, we have at last reached a stopping place, where we expect, for the present at least, to "give our wanderings o'er," and settle down to a more regular and satisfactory mode of life. We reached this place on the 14th inst. The day before, we travelled on the stage from Roseburg on the Southern Pacific R. R., to Myrtle Point on the Coquille River, 64 miles, between the hours of 6 a. m. and 10:30 p. m. For fully two-thirds of the distance the road had been graded out of the mountain side, sometimes reaching an elevation of 300 feet above the roaring river that dashed among the rocks immediately underneath. Not infrequently there were but three inches, if as much, between the outside wheel of the stage and the brink of the precipice, and what with rain, mud, rocks and chunk holes, and the consequent swaying, pitching and jolting of the vehicle, as the four-hourse team, urged by its driver, endeavored to tug it along over that unspeakable road, it was almost enough to make the stoutest heart quail. We had not proceeded far on our journey before Mrs. Parnall, on the inside of the stage, became distressingly "sea-sick," and finally had to take a seat on the outside with the driver in the rain. For about 14 hours she sat in that most trying and dangerous situation, but in her case it was simply the lesser of two necessary evils, and was consequently borne with patience and fortitude; and it is with profound gratitude to God that we record the fact of no serious sickness having befallen her as the result of this terrible experience, only a general shaking up, straining of the muscles, fatigue, etc. For my own part, wrapped in my fur coat, and lap-robe, and in the company with three jolly "travelling men," I had a comparatively good time, except as I would sympatheti cally place myself in the painful position of the suffering one on the outside.

And here we would gently remind our good friends in Montana that they need not flatter themselves in the hope that we shall return to see them again soon, greatly as we should enjoy it. We are certainly "here to stay," possibly until the new railroad now in course of construction, from Marshfield to Roseburg, is ready to take us out. So Mrs. P. sorrowfully says, at least till the winter rains are over, as the wagon road becomes quite impassable to vehicles during that time.

But enough along that line, lest I create in the minds of some the wrong impression that we are suffering from the "blues." On the contrary, I rejoice to say, we are happy in our surroundings, and happy in the love of God. Our health is steadily improving. We believe we are acting along the line of the Divine Will concerning us, hence we feel contented.

I have three appointments on my charge — Coquille, Riverton and Bandon—all on the Coquille River, connected by daily steamboat communications. The latter is a watering place immediately on the coast, which is only twelve miles distant "as the crow flies," from our place of residence at Coquille.

The parsonage at this place, which was correctly reported to be worth $80, and which stands on the same lot with the church, we shall not occupy, but have rented instead a neat little four-roomed cottage, quite new, for $5 per month. We hope to secure a suitable location for a good parsonage.

The church is a fairly comfortable, commodious building, with a seating capacity of at least 200. As a denomination we take the lead of any other in town.

I preached on Sunday morning to about 50 people. In the afternoon I took charge of the Sunday-school, a suitable superintendent having not yet been secured. There were 74 persons present, chiefly young people. This is to me a very hopeful feature of the work. At night Bro. Reagan, my predecessor in charge, preached to nearly a houseful, and received from the citizens a good "caneing," at the close of the service. The earnest, faithful, self-denying labors of our brother during the two years of his pastorate here have well merited such a token of the appreciation of the people as he has thus received.

I must close now for the present, only adding parenthetically, that it does not rain quite all the time here, this being the third clear, sunny day we have enjoyed since our arrival. Greetings to our many friends in your far off mountain land.

Fraternally,
J. B. PARNALL.

Coquille, Ore., Oct. 19, 1892.

FROM ISLAND CITY, OR.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—We are at last settled on our work. The members, and public generally, have given us a most cordial welcome; our congregations are good and we are much encouraged. The brethren very willingly came to our help, and we have the parsonage furnished very comfortably. It is rather a novel experience to one who has so long been considered a "confirmed bachelor" to have to purchase the things necessary to begin house keeping with, but the ordeal is past and we survived. Yesterday quite a number of the good ladies and some of the Sunday-school scholars surprised us with a liberal donation of canned and green fruit, vegetables, cloth, table linen &c., it was a complete surprise and brought cheer to our home. Praise God for these bright spots along the high-way of our lives. Mrs. Bell adapts herself to the itinerant life as if she were trained to it. She is cheerful and happy in her work and encourages me greatly. The good Bishop knew what was best for us and to-day the clouds are dispersed and the bright light of the presence of God is manifest unto us. May the Lord bless you in your labors for the upbuilding of the Kingdom of God.

earnest work for Christ are asked to unite with us in prayer on the day appointed.

The greater the cause for thankfulness for the material blessings bestowed upon our country, the deeper should be our penitence for failures in duty to God and our fellow-men. The subject of prayer for the day is—"that Christ may reign in our land." A special prayer should be made that God will use our society as an instrument in His hands for hastening the coming of His kingdom—that we, the women of the Methodist Church, South, may be awakened by the Holy Spirit to a fuller realization of our responsibility for the spiritual poverty of a land so rich in this world's goods. Let us not, like Cain, bring as a thank-offering the first fruits of the earth, while the blood of our dying brother rests upon our souls, but trusting in the blood of the Lamb, humbly make our confessions before Almighty God, and renew our vows of consecration to His service in the the salvation of souls. We most earnestly desire that all the Auxiliaries shall on that day hold special meetings for prayer.

Wispering in Church.

Little Charley Nash came softly tip-toeing into the pleasant sitting room, where his mamma was lying on the couch suffering from one of her bad headaches, that he might make no noise to disturb her.

"May I go with Fred Gray and Willie Jones to their church this evening, mamma?" he asked.

His mother knew it would be a long evening for her little boy at home, and as she could not go to church with him as was her custom, she told him he might go, adding, "Be sure and be a good boy, and come home as soon as church is out." He told her he would, gave her a good-by kiss, and then joined the other boys who were waiting for him at the gate. They hurried along, for the bell was ringing, and when they reached the church, they took a side pew in the back part of the house alone by themselves, where for a time, they kept as still as mice.

When the minister arose to pray, Charley bowed his head, and listened to what he said; and when the congregation arose to sing, he joined with them, for it was a hymn he had often sung with his mother. He tried to remember the text, so he could tell her when he got home, and then he listened to the sermon. So finally, as Charley began to get tired, he moved a little nearer the other boys, who had begun to whisper, and Charley joined with them, all unconscious of the people who would turn around occasionally to see from whence the sound came.

At the close of the service, the boys caught up their caps and started for the door. The vestibule being crowded, Charley fell back partially behind the door, to make room for the older people to pass out; as he did so, he heard a lady remark, "Who were those boys in the side pews near us, who whispered so?"

The other lady made some reply too low for him to hear, and the one who had first spoken, said, "They disturbed me so that I could not enjoy the sermon. Their mothers could not have trained them rightly at home, or they would never have whispered like that in church." And then they passed on out the door.

The hot blood mounted to Charley's temples for very shame, to think that he, who had, as he hoped, given his heart to the Saviour, and had been taught by a pious mother how wrong it was to whisper in God's house, should be so led away as to bring reproach upon her good name.

As he started for the street his first impulse was to run and tell these ladies that his mamma had taught him better. But it was so dark that he could not see which way they went, and he walked home with the other boys, in silence.

He entered the sitting room, which he had left only a few hours before with such a happy heart, and dropped down on a low seat, away from the light, and fell to thinking. He tried to lay all the blame on the other boys, thinking he would never have whispered if they had not begun it, but he could not quiet his conscience in that way, for his mother had taught him that each one must answer for his own evil deeds.

Finally, as his mother had retired and his sister Maggie was too busy reading her Sunday School book to talk to him, he took his little bed lamp and went up-stairs to his own room, a very unhappy boy. He took his little "Daily Thought" and found his Bible verse for that evening. It was from Psalm 51:2, 3, "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. For I acknowledge my transgressions; and my sin is ever before me." Then he knelt down and asked the dear Lord to wash away and cleanse him from the sins of that evening, and keep him from forgetting the right way, and after he had finished his prayer, he got into bed and soon fell asleep.

The next morning he drew his mother away to where they could talk by themselves, and told her of his conduct at the church the previous evening and of the conversation of the two ladies. She was deeply pained to learn that her own little boy had committed such an offense in God's house, and she told him that she had often been very much disturbed by the frivolity and whisperings of young people near her, and that she hoped he would never again be guilty of such a sin. She saw that he was deeply penitent and had asked the Saviour to forgive him, so she only gave him a few words of counsel, then kissed him good-by, and he started for school with a lighter heart, but with a firm resolve that he would never again whisper in church.—E. M. M. in Advocate and Guardian.

He Reached Their Hearts.

Twelve years ago Rev. Oscar Michelson landed on the Island of onga, in the New Hebrides, alone among cannibals. At first he had many perilous adventures, and again and again fled into hiding to save his life. Once a savage, now one of his best teachers, leveled a rifle to kill him, but was stopped by a look. He persevered amid many threatenings and dangers. His house became known as "The Sunday House," and Christian hymns were often heard mingling with heathen songs. From heart to heart, from home to home, the Gospel won its way, until now thirty Christian teachers are laboring in as many different villages. Mr. Michelson's field now includes, he writes, four whole islands. The people speak three languages. At one meeting three hundred rose for prayer. Ten years ago they proposed to eat him. Now he lives in perfect safety. —Michigan Christian Advocate.

Faith and Chloride of Lime.

There are many persons who put faith in the place of works, and some who would put works in the grace of faith, the results of the transfer always being disastrous.

There are cases when persons live in such a way that they make themselves sick, and pray to be healed; when if they had taken proper care of themselves they would not have been ill, and if they had ceased to do the things that made them ill they would soon have got well of themselves.

John Haberton tells of a preacher who visited a sick man, whose house was filled with poisonous gases from a neglected drain. Talking of faith the preacher said to him: "You don't need to use more faith, but you do need to use some chloride of lime on that drain, if you want to get well."

We have great faith in prayer, but prayer does not clean out drains, or dissipate poisonous gases. The Lord taught His ancient people to pray, and he also taught them to be careful about their food, to keep clean, to take baths, to tear down unhealthy houses, to wear suitable clothing, and deny ungodliness and worldliness, to rest from their labors at the appointed times, to behave themselves in their homes, and to treat their wives and children as they should; and he would not accept prayer as the substitute for any of these things; indeed, He would not allow men to come into His presence or approach His altar, until they had attended to these necessary things; and it is probable many people who now appear in worshiping assemblies would, under the Jewish law, have been entirely shut out from the public worship of God, as unclean, and would have been sent home, to take a bath, wash their clothes, govern their passions, and clean up generally, before they would be allowed to enter the congregation of the Lord, or engage in public worship among his people.

By all means pray for health, wealth, and every good thing; but don't neglect to watch as well as pray, and to work as well as wait; and be sure the Lord would have you do what He commands, if you expect Him to do what you request.

The Christian.

What a Rich Man Said.

I can ride no easier in a fine carriage than you can in an omnibus for five cents, without the trouble of attending to drivers, footmen and hostlers; and as to anything I desire, I can tell you, young man, that the less we desire in this world the happier we shall be. All my wealth cannot buy me a single day more of life—cannot bring back my youth—cannot purchase exemption from sickness and pain—cannot procure me power to keep afar off the hour of death—and then, what will it avail when, in a few short years at most, I lie down in the grave and leave it forever? Young man, you have no cause to envy me.—St. Louis Advocate.

Persecution in Persia.

Now and then we are rudely awakened from the dream that the day of universal religious liberty is at hand. Converts to Christianity are persecuted wherever the flag of a Protestant nation does not float over them.

Rev. Dr. Shedd, of Oroomiah, Persia, writes as follows:

"The most stirring event we have had lately is the arrest of Mirza Abraham, a convert from Islam. He was arrested for preaching and confessing Christ. Brought before the authorities, he was terribly beaten, and every indignity heaped upon him. He confessed his Savior in the midst of all, repeated verses from the Scriptures as they tormented him, told them that they could kill him and shoot him from the cannon's mouth; but they could not take from him his hope in Christ. For three weeks he was in prison here, rejoicing in the Lord and testifying to his fellow-prisoners of the Salvation of Christ. He is now in prison at Tabriz, and we know not whether he will be sent to the Shah, or put to death, or released. It is feared that the Mollahs, who are supported by Russia, have so much greater influence that toleration has little chance. The Shah himself cannot stand before the demands of the Mollahs, and British prestige has greatly suffered in the last few months. Let there be fervent prayer for Persia, that God may overrule this persecution and prepare the way for the kingdom of Christ."

The Wife of Columbus.

Notwithstanding the world-wide celebrity of the great discoverer of America, very little is generally known about his wife. The Chicago Tribune gives the following information respecting her:

"Columbus was married in 1470, or thereabouts, to a Miss Palestrello, of Lisbon, whose father had distinguished himself as a navigator. A part of Miss Palestrello's marriage dower was a great collection of valuable charts, journals and important memoranda. From childhood she had displayed wonderful enthusiasm on the subject, partaking to a marked degree of a speculative and adventuresome idea and schemes in the line of geographical discovery for which Lisbon was then headquarters. She possessed a fine education, was widely known as a brainy, brilliant woman, who was constantly urging her husband on in the path which finally brought him to the wonderful goal with which we are so familiar.

"While a girl, Miss Palestrello made a number of hazardous voyages with her father in unfamiliar waters, and, later, made many geographical drawings, several of which were used with great profit by Columbus when he had won her for his wife, and set out upon his more important wanderings on the great deep. There is probably no picture of this brave, talented woman extant; but certainly it would seem a gracious and most fitting thing that her memory receive some tribute on the forthcoming occasion."

Historical Famines.

Excepting the seven year's famine in Egypt, mentioned in the Old Testament, the first great famine recorded in history occurred in Italy, B. C. 436. The following is a record of historical famine. During some of these famines, people would throw themselves into rivers to escape the torture of hunger and thirst. Many ate grass, herbs and the bark of trees.

B. C. 436	Great Famine in Italy.
A. D. 42	Another famine in Egypt.
" 262	Another famine in Rome.
" 272	Famine in the British Islands.
" 306 to " 310	Thousands perished in Scotland and Britain.
" 450	Great famine in Southern Europe.
" 739, " 823, " 954	Famine in England and Scotland, crops failed and thousands met a miserable death from starvation.
" 1016, " 1193, " 1195	Famine throughout Europe, crops failed and terrible suffering prevailed, people ate cats and dogs.
" 1251 to " 1846	Various famines occurred in Europe. The failure of the potato crop in Ireland caused great suffering.

"European calamities of this kind, however, dwindle into insignificance when compared with the colossal dimensions of famines in the crowded countries of Asia.

A. D. 1837	800,000 starved in Northwest India.
" 1860	Another famine carries away 500,000.
" 1865, " 1866	Famine in Bengal and Orrissa, 1,000,000 supposed to have perished.
" 1868, " 1869	Great famine in Raj pootana, 1,500,000 on death roll.
" 1877	500,000 died in Bombay and Madras.
" 1877 to " 1878	Complete crop failure in China, Most terrible suffering, and 9,500,000 died for want of food.

Where the gospel of Christ goes, with all the arts and sciences and inventions which follow in its train, famine becomes almost impossible. There is the spirit of kindness and brotherly love, which causes people to help each other in time of need; and then there is the wide inter-communication which comes through peace and amity, and provides that the plenty of one land shall make up for the scarcity in another. Then great systems of railway and steamship communication, which are only found where the gospel of Christ has prevailed, afford the means for bringing bread from all quarters to any point where there is need. Hence it will be seen there is abundant reason for the conclusion that famines, like pestilences, have their origin and spend their force in lands destitute of the Gospel of Christ. That gospel, believed and practiced, is a safeguard against war, famine and pestilence, all of which run riot where the gospel is disregarded or unknown.

HEINE'S DEATH-BED.

Henry Heine, one of the most skeptical and cynical writers of the age, had passed through terrible torments caused by a disease of the spinal marrow. One day, as a friend was calling upon him, he said, "If I could only walk on crutches, do you know where I would go?"

"No."

"Straight to the church."

"You jest."

"No, no; straight to the church."

His illness continued, and this is the narrative of another of his friends, who visited him some years later, in 1849:

"I found Heine in Paris, but in what a state! He was lying upon a mattress spread upon the floor. The poor man was almost wholly blind, and his body was a prey to the most poignant anguish; his withered arms stretched lifeless by his side; his disease incurable. His back, burned in spots by the surgeons, was one sore. He seemed the very picture of pain; and yet his fair and noble visage had a strange aspect of peace and submission. He talked of his sufferings as if they were those of another. For a long time I could not understand so much peace and resignation, in the midst of such an experience, especially in the case of one who had declared himself an atheist.

"He was not long in giving an explanation. A smile upon his lips, he described to me yet further the dreadful sufferings he endured, and after having said he should never get better, he proceeded, in that steady and powerful voice which still remained despite his utter weakness:

"'My friend, believe me, it is Henry Heine who tells you so, and after having reconsidered and maturely weighed what has been written on this subject by men of all sorts, believe me I have reached a conclusion that there is a God who judges our conduct, the soul is immortal, and that after this life there is another, when the good will be rewarded and the wicked punished. Yes, this is what Henry Heine says, who has so often denied the Holy Ghost. If ever you have doubted these grand truths, and learn by my example that nothing but simple faith in God's mercy can sustain, without repining, atrocious pains. Without that faith, convinced as I am that my bodily state is desperate, I should long since have put an end to my days.'

"Profoundly moved I seized his hand. He went on: 'There are fools who, after having passed their lives in skepticism and mistake, and denied God in their words and acts, have not courage to own that they are wholly deceived. As for me, I feel compelled to declare that it is a cursed falsehood which long made me blind. Only, at present I see clearly; and any man who knows me must confess that it was not because my faculties have become weak, for never was my mind more clear and strong than it is at this moment.—From a French Newspaper.

Don't Worry or Hurry.

Don't worry because the millennium is delayed in coming. Pray for it, and look for it, and hope for it, and work for it, but don't get sour and disappointed because the chariot wheels turn a little slower sometimes than you want them to. Remember that you are only a private in God's army, and let him do all the planning and leading. It is God's war, and he does not expect us to lie awake at night and fret because the battle has not gone just as it should according to our thinking. Many people give their children a turn toward Satan by trying too hard to hurry them into becoming religious.

Bad Company.

An exchange tells this story, the point of which is well taken and easily comprehended:—

"A young lady of sixteen, who had been piously brought up, was invited to a party at which certain persons of undisguised infidel sentiment were expected to be present. Her father objected to her going.

"I know, papa," she said "that they speak against the Bible and against Jesus; but you may be quite sure that they will do me no harm. I can't help that; but I shall not allow them to affect me in the least."

"My child," said her father, inventing an excuse for the sudden request, "my work can't be interrupted; I have need of a coal. Will you be kind enough to fetch me one?"

"Do you want a live coal, papa?"

"No; one that is dead—burned out."

The coal was brought; the young lady had carried it in her hand.

"Didn't it burn you my child?" asked the father.

Why, no, papa. How could it? It is dead."

"Of course it couldn't; but look at your hand, Florence."

"O, papa, how black my fingers are! I must go and wash them."

"Wait a moment, Flossie. Here is a lesson for you while you are washing them: 'Companionship with the wicked and worldly may not necessarily burn you and destroy you, but it will certainly soil you.' Remember all your lifetime what the apostle says: "Evil communications corrupt good manners."—Selected.

It May Be Your Own Cows.

A gentleman who was riding in the country saw a drove of cows in a field of young cabbages. They had broken a fence, and were rapidly destroying the tender plants. Driving back to tell the man who owned the field, the gentlemen was surprised to hear the man say, "Well, those cows belong to neighbor Parks, and he's able to stand it. I'll make him pay roundly for the damage they will do."

"But it may be your own cows," suggested the gentleman.

"O, no; they ain't. He'll smart for this."

The cows were allowed to stay in the field. They ruined the cabbage crop, and were injured themselves, by overeating; and the man found to his great chagrin that they were his own cows.

When parents keep wines and liquors in their houses because it is fashionable, or rent stores for saloons, or try by any sharp practice to get the better of their neighbors, their own children often learn to drink or gamble, and sorrow and suffering is induced. They may find it was their own cows that destroyed the garden.—Selected.

Home Piety.

It is in the home that character is not only most severely tested, but also comes to its best fruitage. The sacred relationships of the family, in their varied obligations, demand services that, for their fulfillment, call into exercise the noblest expression of self-sacrifice; a discipline of love, that when controlled and guided by spiritual life and purpose, develops the choicest fruits and influence of Christian character. Home piety reveals these qualities in the mightiest force through which the spirit of God works in making the family the saving unit of society. Is not this our great need? Homes redeemed and filled with spiritual light and blessing. The world will not be saved until the family life is purified in its springs of action. The churches cannot do the work for which they are set unless the Christian home lends its aid. The ideal, the meaning of the home must be lifted up. It is not alone a place for the shelter and physical care of loved ones. Above all other duties in the Christian family is that of spiritual training in all the ways of character building. By example, by precept, by education, piety, as expressing the need and life of God in the soul, should be the very atmosphere of the home.—Illustrated Christian Weekly.

The Fox and the Ducks.

A FABLE.

A fox had made his den in a forest near a river, close by the haunts of some wild ducks, upon which he thought he should make many an excellent meal.

At first he was in the habit of pursuing them whenever he saw them out of the water; but he soon found that this mode of warfare would not do any good, for though the ducks were awkward runners, yet when they made use of their wings they soon got out of reach of the fox, and plunging into the river, placed themselves at safe distance from the enemy.

"This won't do," said the fox; "I must try some other means if I am ever to capture any of my feathered neighbors." So one morning he addressed himself to an old duck, who was swimming at a little distance from the shore.

"Good morning, Mrs. Duck," said he; "how charmingly you swim! It is quite a pleasure to watch you. You glide and turn and float with so much more elegance than the swans, with their long awkward throats. I give you my hearty thanks for the treat you are giving me."

The old duck arched her neck, she dived, and rose again, she fluttered, she puffed out her feathers, and performed all her swimming feats.

"Ah!" said the fox, "how do you manage that?—to disappear and come up again! It is truly wonderful. How do you perform that extraordinary act of diving? If I were only as clever as you, I could by it save my life if the hounds should come upon me near the river."

Again and again the old duck dived, and each time the fox called out:

',Charming! delightful! most graceful!"

Then he drew nearer to the edge of the water.

"Do come closer," he said, "that I may take note of each movement accurately. If you would dive from the bank, for instance, I could then copy your evolutions, and after a few attempts I might be able to do it myself, though of course very awkwardly."

So the foolish duck placed herself on the bank.

"Now," said she, preparing to make a plunge, and expecting the fox to do the same.

But Reynard, instead of making a plunge into the river, sprang at the foolish duck, and caught her before she reached the water.

Poor duck! she had not even time to repent her folly in listening to the flattery of the fox.

"Ah!" said the fox, meditatively, as he was dining upon the ill-fated bird, "it is a pity when people believe all the fine things that are said to them!"—Selected.

As You Will.

A man's life is largely what he makes it, virtuous or vicious; his death is largely what he makes it, that of the righteous or of the unrighteous; his eternity is largely what he makes it, that of uninterrupted bliss or of unmitigated woe. In other words, a man is, to a great extent, the architect of his own character, and his character determines his landing place in eternity. The poet may sing:

"There is a Divinity that shapes our end," but, on the ground of man's free agency, it is also to be maintained that there is a Humanity that shapes our end. "Workers together with God" expresses the highest distinction ever conferred on man. The thought is, God and man harmoniously co-operating in the building up of character, or in shaping individual lives and human life in the mass after the perfect pattern of Divine holiness and righteousness. For each man there is a particular line of duty indicated to him by the times in which he lives and the circumstances in which he is placed; or, as it has been familiarly and tersely put, "God has his plan for every man," and it is every man's business to discover God's plan for him, and to work up to it, or shape his life after it.—Ex.

Scissor Points.

If we do not see the golden thread through all the Bible marking out Christ, we read the Scripture without the key.—R. Cecil.

There is one very mean thing about human nature; namely, its disposition to jump on a man when he is down. Ever and anon the community must have a scapegoat, or some one upon whom others can put their wrongdoing. People unload the blame from their own shoulders and put it upon some one who is unfortunate."—Talmage.

God takes a thousand times more pains with us than the author with his picture, by many colors of circumstance, to bring man into the form which is the highest and noblest in his sight, if only we received his gifts and myrrh in the right spirit.—John Tauler.

THE holy Rutherford was once summoned to answer to the next Parliament on a charge of high treason. The summons found him on his death-bed. On hearing of it, he calmly remarked that he had another summons before a superior judge and judicatory, and sent the message: "I behoove to answer my first summons; and ere your day arrives, I will be where few kings and great folks come."—Sel.

ASSASSINATION THE SALOONS' METHOD.—Joseph B. Rucker, editor of the Somerset, Ky., Reporter, who was brutally assassinated the 19th of September, died a martyr to the cause of opposition to the rum traffic. He had been denouncing the whisky gang and their methods in his paper. A year ago he was clubbed for the same act, and both the mayor and chief of police commended the act. He died with his face to the country's monster foe, and the cause for which he died still lives. He was a member of the Prohibition State Committee, and his name will ever stand high up on the roll of honored martyrs alongside of the immortal Haddock of Sioux City and the immortal Gambrell of Mississippi.

I have no faith in that woman who talks of grace and glory abroad and uses no soap at home. Let the buttons be on the shirts, let the children's socks be mended, let the roast mutton be done to a turn, let the house be as neat as a new pin, and the home be as happy as home can be. Even then there will be room for those little deeds of love and faith which, in my Master's name, I seek of you. Serve God by doing common actions in a heavenly spirit, and then fill in the cracks and crevices of time with the holy service.—Spurgeon.

The Sunday-Opening Question.

A great battle was waged and won, fairly and honestly, by the Christian and order-loving people of this land in regard to closing the World's Fair on Sunday. Congress was begged and importuned to give $2,-500,000 to aid the Fair. Finally, the amount was given on condition that the doors be closed on the Lord's day. But now the godless and gain-greedy element of the country—Chicago in particular—is displaying the most "pusillanimous pertinacity" (as the "Tennessee Methodist" characterizes it), that we have seen exhibited in modern times, to try to defeat that action. Having received promise of the money, a petition is being circulated and strongly backed, praying Congress to reconsider its action and remove the restriction. That such a petition should be sent up at all is bad enough, but the plea upon which it is based is the most absurd of all. Its sophistry appears so plainly upon its face that the most inconsiderate "Riding-hood" will scarcely need to be warned against the invitation to "come and kiss me, my dear." The plea made claims to be "in the interest of education and religion," "in the interest of the poor," "of social order, and as a counter-attraction to the saloon and brothel," and in the interest of the local management!"

Pleading for "education" and "religion," and the "poor," indeed! and at the same time seeking the overthrow of an institution which religion has established and perpetuated and which has done more for the education and uplifting of the poor than all the World's Fairs, especially such as that Chicago seems to want—that could be held in a thousand years. The Sabbath is the friend of the poor, and for the benefit of the working man. "In the interest of social order!" and yet it would be the introduction of social dis-order. As a "counter attraction to the saloon!" and yet any one knows that the saloon would exult in the overthrow of the Sabbath, as the destruction of one of its mightiest foes. With the Sabbath out of the way, and the moral sentiment that it fosters, the saloon would have full sway and rule until ruin would be complete.

It is said to be in the "interest of the local management." Yes, this is the truest statement of all. The local management, we are told, has utterly disregarded the Lord's day in the erection of the buildings. The "poor" laboring man has been asked to work like a slave seven days in the week, and whiskey has been furnished to him by the cart-load and the barrel, causing many serious accidents. The opening of the Fair on Sunday would deprive countless thousands of laboring men, those in charge of the grounds, besides ticket agents, conductors, brakemen switchmen, and others, of the rest of the Sabbath and introduce moral pandemonium that would disgrace us as a professedly Christian nation in the eyes of an assembled world. The "local management" seeks the shekels rather than to protect the poor. If Congress were to permit Sunday opening and require free admission to the "poor," what a storm of indignation would be raised by these would-be religionists and philanthropists?

No. All this claim is embodied, in substance, in the words of Satan to the Son of God, when he took him up into an exceeding high mountain and showed him all the kingdoms of the world, saying, "All these will I give unto thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me." Once in the hands of these Sabbath-hating, lucre-loving legions we shall see what they will do with the saloon, and how much—rather how little—they care for education, religion and the poor.

We are sad to know that our two senators and one congressman from Montana, voted against the Sunday-closing clause, and that a number of our Montana editors also oppose it. But let not the Christian and liberty-loving people of our land be discouraged nor relax their efforts, even if the entire ground has to be gone over again. The fight is on; let it be to a finish on this question. Let petitions go up from every heath and hamlet, from every village and valley, from every plain and prairie, every city, canyon, or cottage-home, from every congregation or convention that convenes in the next few months, to our senators and congressmen entering our solemn protest against this insult to the Christian sentiment of this country. Let them know that we are not heathens and that we do not propose to be dominated by pagan ideas and customs. It would be infinitely better for our nation that there be no World's Fair at all than that our Christian Sabbath should be sacrificed to mammon and trampled under foot in the face of nations that we are striving to direct by precept and example to a more excellent way.

HERE AND THERE.

We have completed arrangements for the publication of the "Montana Methodist," weekly, the contract to take effect the first of December. The subscription price remains the same, one dollar a year in advance. We think we are safe in saying the "Methodist" is now the only weekly paper in the church, published at one dollar a year. Our publishers tell us, "We shall endeavor to give you one of the best weekly papers published anywhere in the West." Let our friends go to work. Let old subscribers see that arrears are paid up, and try to send us new names.

By the new arrangement our subscribers get more than double the number of papers the same size for the same price as formerly. But there is quite an addition in the bills that we have to meet every three months. This will necessitate increased activity and promptness upon the part of our patrons Let us not be disappointed. Let there be a long and a strong pull, and a pull altogether. Commence now.

The town of Hamilton, which is located in the upper Bitter Root valley, about six miles south, and a mile or two west, of Corvallis, is growing rapidly. The mammoth saw-mill in operation gives employment to hundreds of men and turns out almost a train load of lumber per day. The Bitter Root Development Company is doing a large business in the way of general merchandise, and the place affords quite a market for the produce of the valley.

A company has been formed, known as the Butte, Anaconda and Pacific Railway Co. for the avowed purpose of building a railroad from Butte to Anaconda and Phillipsburg, thence into the Bitter Root valley, and thence northward through Missoula to the Flathead country where it will intersect the Great Northern which is supposed to be at the back of the enterprise, and where the Anaconda Company owns extensive coal fields. Work is already being rapidly pushed between Butte and Anaconda, and if the plain, positive statements of Mr. Daley and the "Anaconda Standard," the one a leading business man, the other a leading newspaper of Montana, can be relied upon at all, the road will be extended with all possible speed into Bitter Root valley. When it comes it will work a great revolution in prices of real estate and in the material development of one of the finest portions of the great Northwest. Would that the Church of God could keep apace with the material growth of the country that it might educate and control these incoming multitudes for Christ and His Kingdom. Let every Christian be awake, at his post and have on the whole armor of God.

At the time of this writing (18th of November), there has been no snow at Corvallis to lay on the ground. The yards and meadows are green, and the ground is not frozen.

The editor and family greatly enjoyed a visit from Miss Della Herndon, of Virginia City. Miss H. is one of the most accomplished of Montana's fair maidens. She was born and raised in Virginia City, graduated at the Montana College, Deer Lodge, is a zealous Christian and a successful teacher in her native town.

W. H. Leedy, of Lon Lou, recently paid the "Methodist" office a pleasant visit and renewed his subscription. He is a successful farmer, a genial, wide-awake gentleman and greatly desirous of seeing the Church strongly established in his community.

Mrs. R. W. Noble, of Whitehall, sister of the editor's wife, her daughter Gracie, and the baby boy, Edward, recently made a visit of three weeks to our home. To return the compliment, Mrs. S. and the wee ones accompanied them on their return to their old homestead at Whitehall, where nearly a month was spent in pleasant reunions. We know how to sympathize with Brothers Britt and Tabor, who have been left to keep house alone while their wives were visiting "the old folks at home." A Benedict "baching" is a spectacle pitiful to behold. But our days of bondage, for the time, are ended. Silence no longer remains supreme. The rush and rattle of toy wagons and sleds and countless playthings, together with the ring of lusty voices, tells of the safe return of the absent ones, and that life at the homestead is restored to its normal state.

J. W. Winslett, one of the old pioneers of Stevensville, and one of the old substantial members of the church there, has been very sick for several weeks. His life was despaired of for a season. When we visited him he expressed his resignation to the Master's will. He was better at last accounts.

Mr. G. Scott Anderson, with wife and family, of Wallace, Idaho, have been visiting Bro. Waggener, at Stevensville. Mr. A. bought the ranch owned by Rev. T. W. Flowers, near Stevensville. Brother Flowers expects to remove to Grantsdale.

Rev. E. M. Ellis, editor of the "Light of the Valley," and Sunday-School agent of the Presbyterian church for Montana, has lately removed from Stevensville to Helena.

The "Pacific Methodist Advocate" says: "Rev. R. F. Beasley, a supernumerary member of the Pacific Conference, has opened an office as stenographer and typewriter, at 334½ Montgomery street. He reports that Sister Beasley is still at Linden, and is much improved in health. Sister Beasley has long suffered from pulmonary troubles.

Tidings From the Field

Rev. H. B. Terry writes from Oakesdale Circuit, Wash.: We live in the parsonage at Rosalia. Our work appears promising. Have raised already $75 for our parsonage. Hope to get it out of debt and furnished.

KICKAPOO, KAN.

Rev. A. J. Notestine: Have just closed a meeting at this place; 12 conversions, 15 accessions, the church well at work. Am pleased with my charge. Began a meeting at Cummings yesterday. Pray for us.

—Rev. R. H. Shaeffer writes from Helena: We are all well as usual, and moving along as well as can be expected, I suppose. Our great need here and now, as I see it, is a new and nice church. I wish you great success in the paper.

—A private note from J. W. Kemper, Butte, says: We like our new preacher, Brother Alton, exceedingly well. He wants to begin a meeting here soon. I think he will take, and I pray for success.

—Rev. W. O. Waggener is pressing the battle with all earnestness on Stevensville charge. Though recently called to Helena to attend a special meeting of the Board of Church Extension, and also to Wallace, Idaho, where he preached on Sunday and renewed acquaintance with his hosts of friends there, yet he is now engaged in a protracted meeting at Olford's school house, where congregations are good and the prospects are fine for a splendid meeting. Already there has been one conversion.

—We have learned that Brother Bramble was engaged in a special revival meeting at East Helena, but have received no particulars. Doubtless our brother is industriously engaged in some department of the work, and is earnestly sowing the good seed of the Kingdom. May he reap a bountiful harvest this year.

—We are sorry to learn of Sister Goulder's poor health, and trust that it will be of short duration, that our brother may make full proof of his ministry on that large and important charge.

—Brother Stateler recently filled an appointment for the pastor, Rev. W. T. Goulder, at Whitehall, where he was welcomed most cordially by his old friends We rejoice that our venerable brother is still able to go in and out among the people. Hosts of admiring friends are anxiously inquiring when he is going to visit Corvallis and Stevensville again. He will be accorded the freedom of the valley whenever he comes, together with a carriage and driver ready to do his bidding.

—We welcome Brother Palmer to the Northwest, and wish him great success at Heppner where he has entered upon his work with a determination to succeed.

—Glad are we to learn of the cordial reception given to and the favorable impression made by Brother Craig at Spokane. We trust there may be no occasion for another change very soon. Spokane is a growing city and there is a great work to do.

—A short time ago a card from Rev. J. B. Parnall brought the news that the town of Coquille, Ore., was in the midst of a genuine small-pox scare. A patient had been brought in and a real case of small-pox developed, and many opportunities afforded for the spread of the disease. A strict quarantine was instituted, and every precaution observed. Later, our brother writes that they have been wonderfully preserved from the pestilence, and he has nothing worse than a genuine case of the old fashioned fever and shaking ague (which is almost as bad as the small-pox), and is hopeful of a speedy recovery. We rejoice that our friends have been so wonderfully preserved. Well may they say, "Under the shadow of His wings do we rejoice."

QUEEN CITY, MO.

Montana Methodist: — Enclosed find one dollar to pay on my subscription. I want the paper to continue to come. I have received a copy of every issue since I subscribed for it at Gallatin. I love the "Montana Methodist." I hope and pray that it may continue to prosper, and that souls may be saved through its instrumentality.

Respectfully,

JOHN PATTERSON.

FROM HEPPNER, OREGON.

For the "Montana Methodist."

As it is customary for Methodist preachers to introduce themselves, I take this opportunity of becoming acquainted with the brethren of the Northwest. Being a late transfer from the Pacific to the East Columbia Conference, and not having visited any other charges, I have knowledge of none but my own. Here we have a good house of worship, with small membership, and an increasing congregation, large Sunday-school, good prayer-meeting, Epworth League, etc. Our district conference meets here in the spring. Can you not attend Mr. Editor?

Yours in the Gospel,

EDWIN PALMER.

FROM SPOKANE.

Dear Methodist:—We are anxious for our friends to know that Brother Craig, our new pastor, has arrived. Bishop Duncan found him in the Oregon Conference. He is a Westener of long standing; crossed the plains in '52 He followed the slow tread of the ox. Buried his father and mother near the end of the long journey. He preached thirteen years in California and Arizona, has been successful in building up the church wherever he has gone. We hope and pray that Brother Craig will be so filled with the Holy Spirit that the message he bears will reach the hearts of the people, many souls be brought to Christ and baptismal showers of blessings in the church. And then we won't need a transfer.

Sister Craig is a lady of superior qualities, principally raised and educated in Oregon, and is like a sun-shiny day in an Oregon winter.

The church is being fitted up, and the parsonage is in good shape.

Brother Craig preached to us last Sunday on "Hospitality." It made an impression so deep that we surprised them last Tuesday evening by a goodly number of members calling on them in their new quarters, each one presenting them with some of the necessaries of life. We were kindly received. Their rooms being small so we repaired to Brother Krieder's who lives next door. Sister Krieder served refreshments. The evening was spent very pleasantly.

Sister Della Dyer, our faithful organist, is very sick with fever; her many friends are feeling anxious about her.

AN OBSERVER.

FROM EFFINGHAM, KANSAS.

Dear Brother Stanley:—I take great pleasure in sending you the renewal of my subscription for the "Montana Methodist." We read its columns, it has become a fixture in our home that we could not well do without. I only wish that its subscription list would grow so large that it would grow to a weekly, and we could hear from the West oftener. I am still here on the shores of the wonderful "Little Grass hopper," or the Effingham Circuit, as it is now called, doing my second year's service, and working hard to try and do something for the Master's cause, which is indeed languishing in these ends of the earth. Still in the midst of our discouragements we are hopeful that better days may come by and by. May God bless you, brother Stanley, and the "Methodist," and make it a wonderful power for good in the world.

Yours in the Blood of Christ,

J. T. SMITH.

LELAND CIRCUIT.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—I thought I would write a few lines to the "Methodist" soon after I arrived here, but sickness in our own family and the community prevented. So, after these things were adjusted I then decided to wait until after the quarterly meeting which was fixed for Oct. 29 and 30, and it has come and gone. A grand time. The P. E. was reasonably well physically and strong in the "grace which God supplies," preaching to the delight of all.

We arrived here soon after conference and found the good people waiting our arrival, and they gave us a cordial welcome, such as is given to a minister of the gospel. They have comfortably domiciled us in a neat, good house, which they rented until they can build, which will be this conference year, I trust.

Then they went to work and furnished the house, so we are comfortable and are ready to open fire on the enemy's camp.

To show you, Mr. Editor that this good people appreciate this unworthy scribe and know he cannot live on air alone, they assessed for him $450, and furnished him a house.

With all of these things, and some spiritually minded people to help us, we think we will be able to bring up a good report at Pendleton next year.

We hope to be able also, under God, to add many to the church roll and to Christ.

Mr. Editor, you will be welcome at our little town, and in our pulpit any time you come, and our people will be glad to see you. COME!

Yours in Christ,

W. S. HORNBUCKLE, P. C.

Field Notes.

BY J. E. SQUIRES, P. E.

Dear Methodist:—You remember that I left off in my last article with Butte and her new preacher. Well, we have had the pleasure in Deer Lodge of hearing him preach in revival meetings, and have been greatly edified, as the community has been deeply stirred, and several have been converted and added to the church. Meetings still going on.

I found Brother Warren and family well, at Bellgrade, after some severe sickness of one of his little boys since conference.

The threshing machine seemed to "have the field" pretty well; but we had service Saturday night, Sunday at three appointed hours, and held the quarterly conference Monday morning.

Two had been added to the church and some other symptoms of progress were manifest. I was especially pleased at the good, new parsonage at Belgrade.

Bozeman was damp and cold as we went in Monday evening, and Tuesday morning was covered with snow; the quarterly conference was postponed by the mutual consent of P. E. and P. C. Bro. Tabor, who was batching during the absence of his wife in Mo., visiting. His quarterly conference was held the second Sunday in Nov., at which time he means to protract.

A trip to Wallace, Idaho, was a new experience, but a most delightful one. I found a good solid town with much vitality; had good congregation Sunday and Sunday night, (in spite of disagreeable weather,) and a good collection.

I made my home at Bro. Penny's —"Carter House," and there met several of the military officers in charge of that section of country, some of whom attended our services Sunday.

We only need a good wide-awake man for Wallace to make it an excellent point in the near future. No other church there besides ours, but the Episcopal.

On my return I went up to Stevensville, with my brother Robert, who is seeking health in this mountain country. Brother and Sister Collet, formerly of Helena, have a good home at Florence, and made it pleasant for us. Bro. Waggener, with his "abounding hospitality received us, and did much to enlarge the occasion by "showing us around."

Bros. Stanley and Flowers were busy gathering in their field products --the most remarkable potatoes and beets, etc., that I ever saw anywhere.

Bro. Clark met me at the depot at Boulder, and offered to carry my "grip," but I insisted that I was younger than he. But if a man must judge from the work he does among his people, and the spirit he keeps them up to, then he is about the youngest man in the conference. Saturday night service good; Sunday, better and best. Several shouting and happy at "love feast," four forward after the morning sermon, three united with the church. About 70 at S. S.; full house at night. Room was full of men and women Monday morning at quarterly conference. Matters well in hand. Sunday's collection more than the claim for P. E. —the second charge that had come up with that claim. Assessment for P. C. increased, and steps taken for systematic collection of the same--envelope system.

The pastor at East Helena had asked me at Conference to give him a week in revival meetings when I came to his first quarterly conference and I came prepared to stay, and in spite of "the world and the flesh and the devil," we have a good prospect for revival—several have started in the Divine life.

While I preached at Helena last night (after preaching and sacrament in the morning,) Bro. Scoffer went down to help Bro. Bramble in meeting, and will be with him this week. We hold the Helena conference at 10 a. m., this day, after a most delightful Sunday's worship.

Upon the whole I feel like the district is doing well in the opening of the conference year.

There are three new parsonage enterprises on foot, made possible by the grant by the Church Extension Board of the conference, of some funds at its command,—these preachers' homes will stop a great leakage, of precious Missionary money. There are now three revivals in progress in the district, and several other of the brethren begin soon. May the Lord of the harvest help us to reap?

The following list of appointments have been arranged for the second round of the district:

Willow Creek and Whitehall, Dec. 11.

CORRESPONDENCE.

From Oakland, Oregon.

The two August numbers of "The Montana Methodist" have just been received. They are very readable, and, as usual, welcome visitors in our home, although about a month late, owing to the fact that they still come to Albany instead of Oakland.

By courtesy, you have kindly sent the paper for several months past. Thank you! From this time please count me a subscriber. Enclosed you will find amount of subrcription. I trust you will succeed in securing sufficient patronage to justify you in making it a weekly. A good church paper is one of the most potent factors in promoting the cause of a pure Christianity. It not only imparts needed information, but is an inspiration to those who toil for the uplifting of the world to Christ. To us in this western field, there is, beyond question, an "open door" for our church, "but there are many adversaries." We need all the help we can get. Everything that tends to stimulate and encourage, to strengthen and establish should be utilized to its fullest extent. A first-class religious journal should never be employed as a substitute for pastoral work, much less, a poor one, but it is the next thing to it. Each succeeds best with the help of the other.

We greatly admire the zeal and energy, the pluck and enterprise of your conference. You provoke us to good works. Brother Waggener's "Character Sketches" were enjoyable. His alliteration was unique.

We sympathize with you in your loss (by transfer) of three good men from your conference, but glad Bro. Parnall comes to us. We will welcome him, and pray that this genial climate may restore his health. Bro. Price goes back to Arkansas. As our wives have the same father and mother, we feel an especial interest in them. We trust that the health of Sister Price and Olin may be given back to them, and that Bro. Price's return to school may demonstrate the wisdom of his course, and redown to the glory of God in his enhanced usefulness.

Brother Shaffer takes his place. You were fortunate in securing him for that important center. We were associated together in the Southwest Mo. Conference for a number of years. He is an able preacher, and a good man. I trust he and family will like the western work, and have a pleasant and successful year.

We were sorry to see that Brother Stateler had to go on the superannuated roll. He has served well his generation. One of his old parishioners, Sister Carter, of Albany, Oregon, often spoke of him during my pastorate there last year. She still revers his memory, and delights to dwell upon the visits he made as pastor to their home in Montana many years ago.

Our conference convenes in a few days in Albany. We have had some success. Have built a few churches and parsonages, and some souls have been saved through the "foolishness of preaching." Alas! the number is far too small. The Lord grant us more seals to our ministry another year!

We have a number of good men in this conference, one of whom, W. B. Smith, transfers from us to the Pacific Conference. He is a faithful servant of Christ, and we regret to give him up.

We need a number of men to transfer to us, men who both know and love the doctrines and usages of our church, and who are not afraid to "endure hardness." May the Lord of the harvest send—thrust out—more laborers into his harvest!

Yours Fraternally,
H. S. SHANGLE.

Kind Words.

BY MRS. ANNA ST. CLAIR.

"Kind words are little sunbeams. They sparkle as they fall."

We all know how the little sunbeams dance and sparkle, making everything seem brighter and more cheerful, and how dull and gloomy we feel when the clouds obscure the sun. Have you never seen the sunbeams glancing, dancing, sparkling through the thick, leafy woods, making the shadow that would otherwise seem almost gloomy, bright and pleasant.

It seems to me we could not find a more fitting type of kindly words. Only God can measure the good they do. For by speaking kind words we not only make our own lives more bright and pleasant, but all lives with which we come in contact.

How often in our own lives we have felt the need of kindly words. When, with body all worn, spirit drooping and all seemed dark and dreary, when we were almost ready to give up, some one spoke the sympathizing word, and our hearts leaped to life again, and we felt strengthened anew for the battle. Did we not bless the one who gave the boon?

But it is in the home where I think most of all we need the kindly spoken words. O! how many homes have been blasted and broken because of unkind words spoken by one of the loved ones in that home.

The home is a minature world. We find in it the different temperaments, likes and dislikes, and we need to guard well the lips that no unkind words should ever pass them. God help us all to daily utter the prayer of David. "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, keep the door of my lips."

Can we not be more forebearing to those whom we think in the wrong and leave not behind us the sting of bitter, fault-finding words? We know that the "wounds of a friend" are sometimes to be given, but are we sure that love alone prompts the words every time we wound?

When those unkind, harshly-spoken words were uttered by that loved one, did we, who received them, believe it was love that prompted them, that it was only their interest in us that made them speak like that?

We sometimes censure ourselves very bitterly for the thoughtless, unkind words to that one who has passed from us forever. Can we not learn from past experience to be more thoughtful and tender to those whom we still have with us, and give them of our best, making their short stay with us bright and pleasant?

If we do not give of our best, are we not burying our talent, and how can we answer Him at his coming when he hath given us the tongue of the learned so that we should know how to speak a word in season? Solomon tells us that a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver.

Could anything be more costly or precious?

Oh! if we could only remember that we will be held responsible for every word spoken, whether it be good or whether it be bad, would we not watch our words more carefully and try to realize more fully what James meant when he said: "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man."

You can't stumble and fall by the way-side, if you hold fast to the hand of God.

As heaven sends her dews to earth, those on earth should render their dues to heaven.

From Palouse to Pendleton.

From Palouse City we had a delightful ride across the country in a wagon to the home of Brother J. S. Randolph where we spent a day and night most delightfully. It was here that we got to see a "header" in operation. It is drawn by six horses, and goes in front of them. The driver occupies a platform in the rear of the team, and guides the machine by means of a lever. He can also raise and lower the sickle at will. The sickle is about twelve feet long and is so gauged as to clip the heads of the grain. The grain is elevated and dumped into a large wagon-bed made on purpose, which is driven alongside of the machine. When it is full it is driven away to the stack, and another takes its place. One man does the loading, three teams are required to do the hauling, with about two men on the stack. It is customary to cut and stack the grain for about one dollar and a quarter per acre. It is amazing to see the steep hillsides that are climbed by these headers. They usually cut twenty or twenty-five acres in a day.

We also saw a threshing machine in action. The grain is furnished to the machine by means of an immense hay fork operated by horse power, and two men feed the machine with pitch forks, though the cylinder is ten or twelve feet distant from where the grain is forked in. The grain is sacked for market as it comes from the spout. Two men sow the sacks as fast as they are filled. The engine burns straw for fuel, which is quite economical. It saves wood, which is very scarce in some parts here, and helps the farmer to dispose of his straw. We were treated to some very delicious pears and peaches that grew in this vicinity.

We took the Union Pacific train at Garfield about noon, and ran down to Dayton, arriving there about five-thirty P. M. This is a beautiful town located on the Touchet (pronounced Tusha) river in the midst of a rich agricultural and fruit growing country. It is the county seat of Columbia county, numbers about 2000 population, and contains many intelligent, well-disposed and well-to-do people. We have a beautiful and commodious church edifice, centrally located, and by it a nice little parsonage with four or five rooms, built under the superintendency of the present pastor, Rev. J. H. Shelton. We were delighted to see our cause so well domiciled in the center of such a population, and in the heart of such a rich country, and to know that our Missouri preacher is so popular with the people. While here we were the guest of the pastor and wife, Prof. Payne, Brother Hanger and family, and we visited the homes of a number of our people where the "Methodist" finds a cordial welcome. We would gladly have tarried a week in this delightful spot, but were compelled to hasten on, passing the lovely town of Walla Walla, (Many Waters) with its 5000 population, and homes embowered in shade and fruit trees. Here we left Brother Howard and his two daughters returning home from Conference, and hastened on to Weston, 25 miles below and were soon comfortably domiciled in the home of Brother Thomas Price, who lives in a brick house a short distance from the depot. After our host spoke of having entertained our dear Bishop Marvin in his home we were soon well acquainted and strangely thrilled at the thought of crossing the path and seeing the foot-prints of that sainted man who did so much to establish our Methodism in this Northwest.

Weston is one of the oldest towns of eastern Oregon. We have a good substantial church and ought to have a much better parsonage than the present one. It was a great pleasure to us to be in the home of Brother Adkins and his excellent wife, also to share the hospitality of Brother and Sister Michael and their family. They were nursing a very sick boy.

What experiences can be told by those who have been in the front of the battle, and by those noble women who have "tarried by the stuff"—a very important, yea, essential factor in the success of the campaign—during the last twenty years or more. Brother Adkins took us out calling, and we drove across the prairie to Athena, a town of several hundred inhabitants. We made some pleasant acquaintances, and secured quite a number of subscribers for the "Methodist." The country is more broken than at Walla Walla, but the soil is rich and wonderfully productive. Wheat, wheat, wheat! We never saw such piles and piles of wheat before as those at the railroad stations all through this country. The depots and warehouses were full, and it was stacked up ten or twenty feet high on the platforms outside. Buyers were only offering from fifty-two to fifty-five cents a bushel, and farmers were holding for better prices.

Weston numbers about 800 inhabitants. Several annual conferences have been held there. The cashier of the bank, Theo. Davis, is the superintendent of our Sunday school. Brother Adkins is in favor with the people, and we trust that Brother Fancher will win all their hearts.

After tarrying twenty-four hours we boarded the six o'clock evening train and, in company with Brother Michael, ran down to Pendleton, 22 miles farther, where we had an appointment to preach at half past seven o'clock.

Departed.

James Walter, son of Joseph and Mary Simpson, departed this life near Corvallis, Montana, the 8th of October, 1892; age, 1 year, 8 months and 14 days. The following lines were written in memory of little Walter by his great grandmother, Mrs. Boroughs, who is 73 years of age.

Little Walter, how we miss thee,
Though so transient was thy stay,
Lent us by the Lord of Glory
For to cheer the darksome way.

How we miss thy gentle prattle
And thy more than angels' smile,
As thy artless ways so winsome,
Did the weary hours beguile!

But O thou precious darling
Lent us only for a day!
Soon we heard the angels calling
"Blessed brother come away."

The little hands were folded,
And the pulseless heart at rest;
For the spirit of our darling
Was among the sainted blest.

Missoula County Sunday School Convention.

The Missoula County Sunday School Convention (interdenominational) was held in Corvallis, commencing November 15th, at 7:30 P. M. Owing to the temporary absence of the president, A. D. Raleigh, E. M. Ellis called the convention to order, and it was opened with the usual devotional exercises, reading the scriptures, singing and prayer.

Rev. W. S. Bell, president of the State Sunday school convention, was present and gave a general account of the Sunday school work, as represented in the state and county conventions, after which F. J. Salsman discussed the relation of the Sunday school to the church. It was decided that wherever at all practicable the Sunday school should be controlled by the church, and its officers chosen by the church, or at least by the adult members of the school.

On the second day, at 9 A. M., Dr. Raleigh was in the chair and conducted the devotional exercises. E. J. Stanley welcomed the convention in a short speech which was fittingly responded to by the president. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President, Rev. A. D. Raleigh; Vice-President, S. J. Salsman; Secretary, Rev. F. L. Cook; Assistant Secretary, Rev. W. O. Waggener; Treasurer, Rev. J. H. Hope; Executive Committee, Rev. A. D. Raleigh; (ex-officio), Rev. F. L. Cook (ex-officio), Mr. Ferd. Kennett, Rev. O. C. Clark, Mrs. Horning, Rev. W. O. Waggener, Mrs. G. E. Ireland.

The following subjects were discussed at the morning and evening sessions: "How to manage the troublesome scholar," by J. J. McAllister; "How to manage the absent scholar," by W. S. Bell; "How to aid the scholars to Christian decision," by F. J. Salsman; "How to teach a lesson," by J. H. Hope; "Getting and holding attention," by G. E. Ireland; "How to review," by A. D. Raleigh; "The responsibility of the rising generation in the closing years of the century," by W. S Bell. The same subject with reference to temperance, by G. E. Ireland; with reference to the Sabbath, by F. L. Cook; with reference to social purity, by E. J. Stanley. At the conclusion of the discussion on the last topic, Revs. E. M. Ellis, J. J. McAllister and A. D. Raleigh made some stirring remarks.

W. S. Bell answered the questions in the question box.

The report of the Secretary showed about 28 Sunday schools with about 600 scholars in the county.

The convention passed resolutions protesting against the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday, and petitioned our delegates to Congress to use their influence against Sunday opening.

Thanks were returned to the people for their hospitality, and to E. M. Ellis for the part he had taken in making this and previous conventions in Missoula county a success. Deep regret was expressed at his removal from the county. Rev. F. L. Cook conducted the singing, for which he is most admirably fitted, in a manner delightful to all. The presidency of Dr. Raleigh was highly satisfactory. There was a good attendance of visitors from adjacent communities. The congregations were large and attentive. At the last session the large church was crowded, and the discussions and services made a profound impression. The utmost harmony and good feeling prevailed, and the convention was looked upon as a decided success. It will meet in Missoula next year.

M. E. Church District Conference.

Our brethren of the M. E. Church (North) are falling into line with us in the matter of holding district conferences, having recently closed a very interesting and profitable session at Bozeman. From the "Advocate" we gather the following notes concerning it:

Elder Mills then read an interesting and appropriate address on Methodism—the condition of the church 150 years ago; the rise of Methodism and the results of this great religious movement of the 18th century. He showed from the testimony of eminent and unprejudiced witnesses that vital godliness was so low that it was scarcely discernable. Sermons were merely moral essays, while even immorality was fearfully prevalent among the priests of the Church of England, who were, of course, shamefully neglectful of their work. The contrast between the time when Wesley was the worst-hated man in all England, and the respect his old age received, together with the tributes now universal to his genius and worth, was drawn, followed by an account of the influence of Methodism upon all other Christian denominations, and her prominence as a leader in missionary movements, and in all the moral reforms of our age. The secret is real vital religion, resulting in an intelligent and sustained enthusiasm for the salvation of souls, and the spread of scriptural holiness over all lands.

A paper on "How to Promote Church Loyalty," was read by Rev. Geo. Comfort. It is to be promoted by a conception of the place of the church in the purpose of God; by a knowledge of the thrilling history of our own denomination; by having plenty to do; by love for Christ. Sectarianism and prosylitism are to be condemned. A spirited discussion followed, participated in by the laity present.

The Methodist District Conference, at its meeting in Bozeman this week, discussed the question of how to deal with members who thresh on Sunday. We have a suspicion that the best thing to do with a church member who will thresh on Sunday, is to induce him to attend a revival in the hope of converting him.—The New Issue.

Teach Your Boy to be Useful.

"I can not dig; I am ashamed to beg." The man who uttered these sentiments is not alone in this world. A false plan of rearing children results in a very large crop of young men who are in the very same trouble. We can not hope for any good to come of such.

"I can not dig," not because he is crippled, not because he is an invalid, not because there is not work to be found, not because he could not make a living that way, but because he has a notion that to do so is a disgrace. He can waste his Lord's money with less sense of shame than he could go into the field and dig for a living.

The false sentiment which we succeed so well in distilling into the minds of the young does them far more harm than the most abject poverty could possibly do them.

Those whose training has been such that they "can not dig" are always too proud to beg; so what can they do? This class of men keep up the ranks of gamblers, sharpers, defaulters, office-seekers, etc.

Teach your boys some trade. Teach him to dig and you will save him from many a temptation to be dishonest.—Selected.

The Little Graves.

A young husband and wife were walking, one summer evening, through a country churchyard, and they were attracted by two little graves, side by side, on which were laid wreathes and crosses of fresh flowers. The date of the little ones' death was seen by the headstone, some years back. The names were those of two children, only two and three years old, and underneath were the words, "Thy will be done."

"How dreadfully sad! said the young husband.

"If our baby were to die I could never say that," said the young wife, pointing to the text.

"Let us hope you will not be tried," said the young husband.

But when they got home that night they found the baby ailing, and, before very long, a little grave—such a little grave—had to be dug for it, too. For a time the poor mother's heart rebelled terribly. She mourned as one who had no hope, and on the tomb stone of her little one she had inscribed the words, "If I am bereaved of my children, I am bereaved." Later on, through years of trial and suffering, God led her to a better mind, and, when a woman, old in sorrow and in years, she visited the grave where husband and child were now both lying, she resolved to have that murmuring inscription altered and instead of it was written, "Where the treasure is, the heart is also;" and beneath again, the text that once she thought she could not say, "Thy will be done.'

Outdone by a Boy.

A lad in Boston, rather small for his years, works in an offiice as errand boy for four gentleman who do business there. One day the gentlemen were chaffing him a little about his being so small, and said to him:

"You never will amount to much; you never will do much business; you are too small."

"Well," said he, "as small as I am, I can do something which none of you four men can do."

"And what is that?" said they.

"I don't know as I ought to tell you," he replied.

But they were anxious to know, and urged him to tell them what he could do that none of them were able to do.

"I can keep from swearing!" said the little fellow.

There were some blushes on four manly faces, and there seemed to be very little anxiety for further information on the point.

Persistence.

In a recent interview, Mr. Edison, speaking of his efforts to make the phonograph reproduce aspirated sound, said:

"From eighteen to twenty hours a day for the last seven months, I have worked on this single word 'specia, specia, specia,' but the instrument responded, 'pecia, pecia, pecia.' It was enough to drive one mad! But I held firm, and I have succeeded."

"But I held firm,"—there is a fullness of power, a mine of latent strength in the words; and the secret of Edison's marvelous success may lie therein concealed.

There is little in the world that aspires to permanence that is achieved without dogged, tireless, stubborn persistence. You may have genius, young man, but without persistence it is no more genius than—to use Emerson's figure—a bushel of acorns is a forest of oaks. Longfellow said, "Genius is infinite painstaking," and there is little that will not yield to persistent painstaking. The great log yields to the tiny insinuating wedge, the rock to the oft-returning drop of water. Stick to your every day work, through Monday and Tuesday and Wednesday. Keep at it, and difficulties will split assunder, and obstacles yield even as the rock to the rain drop. "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings."—Selected.

The Man With One Talent.

The fate of the indolent servant has a double horror. It is loss and suffering. The talent is taken from the slack hands and coward heart that would not use it, and given to the man who has shown he could and would. Gifts unemployed for Christ are stripped off a soul yonder. How much will go from many a richly endowed spirit, that has flashed with unconsecrated genius and force! We do not need to wait for eternity to see that true possession which in use increases powers, and that the disuse, which is equivalent to not possessing, robs them. The blacksmith's arm, the scout's eye, the craftman's delicate finger, the students intellect, the sensualist's passions, all illustrate the law on its one side; and the dying out of faculties and tastes, and even of institutions and conscience, by reason of simple disuse, are meloncholy instances of it on the other. But the solemn words of this condemnation seem to point to a far more awful energy in its working in the future, when everything that has not been consecrated by employment for Jesus shall be taken away, and the soul, stripped of its garb, shall "be found naked." How far that process of divesting may go on faculties, without touching the life, who can tell? Enough, to see with awe that a spirit may be cut, as it were to the quick, and still exist.—Dr. McClaren.

The Unbearable.

George McDonald makes a very true remark when he says "Things are unbearable, just until we have them to bear; their possibility comes with them." This we have all experienced more or less, but we have not learned from our experience. We are often as much daunted now as ever we were, when we meet with trials which are really no greater than those through which they have gone already. How many things have been gone through, and even well been come out of, concerning which we declared that they would be our death; we sometimes on looking back on them wonder how we ever went through them—we don't know how we did--but we did. The fact is imagination conjures up a multitude of terrors of its own; w die, as it is said, "a thousand deaths in fearing one." Anticipation is often worse than reality. As no man knows what he can do until he tries, so no man knows what he can bear until he is tried. Until the time of actual trial comes, we do not experience the grace which belongs to it; if we felt the grace, we should face the trial. "I can never cross that boiling river," says the traveler when he sees it from a distance foaming on its rushing way; but when he comes up to it; he finds the foam and the rush are made by the great stepping-stones which have been put across the stream. "I can never climb that mountain," says the traveler, as he sees it looking almost perpendicular at a distance; but when he comes close to it, he finds there is here a stone and here a little hole, which give him foothold. And here is a tuft of grass, and here a bit of heather by which he can pull himself up, and so the impossible becomes the possible, as soon as it has to be done.—Selected.

An Arrow That Hit.

The system the humorous papers have of scattering jokelets through their advertising pages is supposed to be of much advantage to the advertiser, but it occasionally has an opposite effect. Mr. George Batten directs my attention to one of these mediums in which a startling example of the mal-apropos in advertising occurs, and enquires whether the advertiser, in all justice, could not demand another insertion. In fine type appears this little announcement:

Read these little three lines.
Buy Blank's Extra Dry Imperial Champagne if you want a fine and delicious drnik.

Directly above it in overshadowing type was this

One of the men of whom the devil eels the surest is the moderate drinker who thinks he is safe.—Ram's Horn.

Heretofore advertisers have been quite content to order an advertisement "next to pure reading matter," but if this sort of thing keeps up they will soon want to be editing the paper itself.—Selected.

Mother's Song.

Hear! I warn thee, son of mine,
Look not on the gleaming wine!
Shun the bright, convivial bowl,
It hath woe for flesh and soul.
Flee, I charge thee son of mine,
Come not near the mocking wine!

By thy childhood's golden years,
By thy mother's hopes and fears;
By the sacred Sabbath chime,
By the hopes of heaven sublime,
Let me warn thee, son of mine,
Look not on the deadly wine!

By the sacred place of prayer,
By the God who waits thee there;
By the sire whose early tomb
Opened in his manhood's bloom
Hear me plead, O son of mine,
Look not on the deadly wine!

By the years that wait thee still,
Fraught with good, or charged with ill;
Ever as thy course shall bend
To a low or lofty end,
Hear once more, O son of mine,
Ever turn thy back on wine!

Sunday Newspapers.

The following is taken from an address by Rev. Prof. Merrick Johnson, D. D., as published in the Christian Statesman:

WHAT IS THE SUNDAY NEWSPAPER?

Let us be honest. The Sunday newspaper is not the Sunday religious or semi-religious paper; it is not the Sunday moral reform or semi-moral reform paper; it is the Sunday newspaper. Just that and that only. It is not the newspaper in partnership with Sunday to promote mutual interests and to share the profits. The profits all go to the newspaper, and Sunday stands all the losses. The Sunday paper is simply the daily newspaper thrust into Sunday; published seven days in the week instead of six; unchanged as to its essential character. It is enlarged, indeed, but neither revised nor reformed, and certainly not sanctified or glorified.

When the newspaper first appeared on Sunday it changed its clothes a little. But the wolf soon got tired of trying to look like a sheep, and now the wolf enters Sunday, a stark wolf, scarcely downing a bit of the woolly fleece he put on when he was keeping up appearances. And you can see no difference between the Sunday and the Saturday paper, save as to magnitude. It is a great mosaic; a huge conglomerate of all sorts of material pertaining to the world, the flesh, and the devil. It is a vast blanket of information, some of it—a great deal of it—hot inherently unwholesome; but all of it secular, worldly, of the earth, earthly; and some of it—very often a great deal of it—vicious, pernicious and unclean. Is is just such a dish as we have served to us every other day of the week except as to size, and it is seasoned and garnished and tricked out with every possible device to tempt the appetite and to gorge the social, literary, and sensational stomach. It is a sheet like unto the sheet of the apostolic vision; like it in this, that it is a "great sheet" and "full of all manner of four-footed beasts and creeping things" but unlike it in this, that it was never "dropped down from heaven," and of its contents it never could be said, "What God has cleansed." This is the Sunday newspaper.

WHY IS IT HERE?

Some say, "Because the people want it." But let that doctrine be be pressed—push it far enough; let it once be understood that what the people want they must have, and we have begun to play sad havoc with our morals. The people out in Utah want polygamy; they would vote it to-day by a rousing majority, but the government does not intend to let them have it. Down South they wanted slavery, and alas! the government was disposed to foster it and compromise with it; but in the thunder of our civil war God said, "Let my people go." The anarchists of Haymarket Square, Chicago, wanted a larger liberty, but American justice took anarchy by the throat and hanged it by the neck until it was dead, and buried it out of sight, and there is no prospect of immediate resurrection. Clearly, what the people want, it is not always best that the people should have.'

Thirty or forty years ago, there was no desire for the Sunday newspaper: Prier to our civil war there was scarcely a Sunday newspaper published in the country. The war led to the indulgence. And now that this appetite has been created by the Sunday newspaper through having taken advantage of a great national exegency, it turns about and says, "The people want it, and therefore it must be published."

NOT ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY.

Again it is pleaded as a reason why the Sunday paper is here, that it is a necessity of our time. It is claimed that the marvelous activity in every department of thought and effort, the press and rush of this busy age, the conditions of society, and the facilities of intercommunication, make the Sunday newspaper an indispensable adjunct and factor in our modern civilization.

But the Philadelphia Ledger, the most widely circulated, and probably the most pecuniarily profitable paper in the second largest city in the Union, is not published on Sunday. It may be replied to this that the Ledger is only a local paper, confined chiefly to Philadelphia, and though it has an immense subscription list the paper is made up mostly of "Wants," and therefore is not to be taken as an illustration. Well, there is Toronto, a city of no mean repute; it has no Sunday newspaper. "Yes," says New York or Chicago, "but Toronto is rural, a slow-coach, country town—hardly in touch with the times. No Sunday paper, may do for Toronto, but it will not do for a city astir with modern enterprise and vast populations." Well, there is London. London is big enough, is it not? London is enterprising enough, is it not? It is five or six or seven times as large as Chicago; two or three times as large as New York. London could swallow Chicago, and only bulge a little on one side to show where it had stowed Chicago away. London's commerce sucks every thing into it. London wealth determines prices the world over. London culture sets the standard of pronunciation for all English-speaking people. Surely, London is big enough. Yet London has no Sunday newspaper. Do you not see that the plea of necessity is simply an absurdity? No! the Sunday newspaper is here for the money there is in it, and there are men, decent and respectable men—I grieve to say it, some professedly Christian men—that are trampling on the Sabbath and despising God's law and weakening the bulwark of our free institutions because of the dollars that are found on the road.

WHAT IS THE SUNDAY NEWSPAPER DOING.

In the first place, it is keeping an army of workmen from the rest to which they are entitled; a day they need, and ought to have, in the interests of health, of good citizenship and of morals. To urge, in reply, that the work on the Sunday paper is done on Saturday is puerile. Why? Because it does not meet the issue. It is child's play, like turning the hands on a clock. Seven day,s work takes seven days to do it in. That disposes of half the meat in this old chestnut. The other half is adjustment.

Want Them Wide Open.

The Interior, our Presbyterian contemporary in Chicago, has shown enterprise and good judgment, too, in spiking the main battery of the friends of the Sunday opening of the Exposition. It sent a reporter to interview the saloon keepers and to verify the statement that the saloon keepers favored closed gates. Here is the result: In a personal interview with each proprietor, or bar-keeper, not one in three favor closing the Fair on Sunday. The great majority was overwhelmingly in favor of a wide open Fair, and a wide open bar, and a wide open hereafter. Among this number were the shrewd leaders of this iniquitous host. The McGarigles, the Varnells, men whose deft hands at cards have been no less deft in controling municipal politics. The list also includes The House of David, The Jonah, The Vestibule, 134 Clark," and others of those wily traps of Satan which many a parent and many a wife knows too well as the gilded stalking pits where son or husband has been ruined. The few who were "with the church" in this matter were the small fry, of the hotel bar keepers From interviews with the former, it was evident that their opinions had been formed by newspaper statements that a closed Sunday would benefit the saloon. It took The Interior man about ten seconds to convince them that an open Sunday would attract a host of excursionists, and would therefore benefit the soloons.—Young Men's Era.

SOCIAL PURITY.

No more important question is before the public to-day than that of Social Purity (unless it should be that of individual purity, for the two are closely allied). Impurity in the individual soon finds expression in the social relations. We are social creatures, and dependent upon each other in a large measure, for that which constitutes our life. "No man liveth unto himself." And as the habits and customs that are observed by us in the social circle have much to do with the formation of character, in regulating the home life, as well as individual life, it is important that we look well to the standard we recognize here.

In the first place we fear that the standard by which society is governed in a large measure to-day, is one-sided, and hence unjust; and we cannot hope to do much toward removing these evils which are corrupting our homes and ruining our young people, until there is a change. Take, for instance, the saloon. As society is now constituted in many places, the man may visit it, spend his earnings there, take a social glass, or even drink to excess, and now and then enjoy the luxury of an old-fashioned spree, go home drunk and covered with the filth and slime of the gutter, and yet society condones the offense, calls it an idiosyncrasy, and still welcomes him to its fellowship. What if the wife, the mother, the sweetheart, or the lady friend should adopt the same course and indulge in the same sweet luxury (?). What a furore there would be! What a crusade and a cry would be raised against an institution that was cursing our daughters, wives and mothers!

Again, we have known of a young man, or possibly a husband and father, to depart from the path of virtue. And although the fact was commonly known, ere long the erring one, without penitence or apology, was smiled upon, admitted into happy homes and treated as though he were an angel. What if it had been his sister, or any member of the female sex who had stepped aside? How different the result! A life time of correct conduct could not cancel the crime! We know that the law in part regulates this. People go from one extreme to another. Woman, in her true position, is accorded the highest place on earth—is "but little lower than the angels"—in man's estimation. Falling from this high plane, the condemnation is great, and the holy mount difficult, if at all possible, to regain.

But be that as it may, we can never preserve that high standard of purity sought after in social life until we make the crime of transgression as great for one party as for the other. If we would ostracise the female denizen of the house of shame, let us frown with equal disdain upon the culprit who sought or wrought her ruin, or seeks to perpetuate it.

Let these principles be instilled into the minds of the children around the hearthstone, in the Sunday-school, from the pulpit, and let purity of heart and life be sought after by the lover of the pure, the true and the good.

—o—

HERE AND THERE.

The communication from "The Land of Flowers" brings with it an aroma that pervades the atmosphere of the country from whence it came, and doubtless it will prove refreshing to many of our readers throughout the Northwest. We trust that our fair correspondent will favor us with such letters frequently.

Rev. F. F. St. Clair writes with his accustomed earnestness and boldness. He strikes home on some points touched. He will be missed greatly in East Columbia, and it is earnestly hoped that his absence will be only for a season.

Some choice matter in the way of selections had to lie over this week. But our readers will enjoy the interesting correspondence.

Will not each preacher and Sunday-school worker who reads the "Methodist," especially those anywhere between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean, send us a few items on a postal card, concerning the progress of the work in his field. Tell us just what you would if we were to meet you on the street, and ask you in person how you are getting along. There is surely something that is encouraging. It will take but a minute and cost but a cent to tell it, and perhaps it will be worth hours of time and dollars in money to the cause of Christ, in the faith and courage it will kindle in the hearts of fellow comrades in other parts of the field where the battle is raging, and who are just longing for such a message as you can send. "Watchman, what of the night!" Several thousand people await your response. Let us have it by next mail. Brother, sister, we mean YOU. Now, then, don't disappoint us.

Our good Brother King, editor of the Montana Christian Advocate, makes pleasant mention of a number of religious papers of Montana and their editors, including this paper and its editor, (only he got our initials "E. M." instead of "E. J.") and remarks that The Advocate, his paper, is the only one not a monthly, his being a semi-monthly. We would respectfully inform our brother that the "Montana Methodist" has been issued twice every month since the last of July, 1888, and is now issued weekly.

WANTED.—One thousand bran new subscribers to the "Weekly Montana Methodist." If every person who takes the paper will get his or her neighbor to subscribe, we shall soon have the required number. It costs only one dollar a year, not quite two cents a week.

The most potent factor in the affairs of life are often the most noiseless in their operation. There was less furore and excitement in connection with the last election than any other within our memory, and yet it marked the greatest revolution in the political world that the country has witnessed for several decades.

There are many things to be learned from the recent election. It shows that the American people still have wills of their own. If one party, or administration, does not please them they will try another. Let our public officers make a note of this fact, and let our people take courage, and continue to agitate and keep before the public measures that are true and right, with the assurance that they will win in the end.

A long stride has been made toward the banishment of sectionalism from our politics. The effort to break the "solid South" was followed by sundering the "solid North;" and the fear of the "Force Bill" once removed, we predict the same result will follow in the South-land. We hail with joy the day when the "bloody-shirt" shall be buried forever, and when it may be said of all portions of our common country, North, South, East and West, "how good and how pleasant for brethren to dwell together in unity."

The meeting of the National W. C. T. U. Convention in Denver, Colorado, was a grand affair. There were 380 delegates present, representing 42 States, 5 Territories, and the District of Columbia, 48 in all. The convention was held in Trinity M. E. Church, and was welcomed by the Governor of the State, the Mayor of Denver, the pastor of the church, a representative of the press, and various other local organizations, all of whom uttered many words of encouragement to the heroines of the white ribbon. The meetings were large and enthusiastic.

The indefatigable, the irrepressible, the heroic and noble spirited Miss Willard, the great central magnet (humanly speaking) of the movement, was present, having crossed the ocean from England, whither she had gone to rest for a season. One of the welcomers characterized her as "the only woman who has succeeded in hiving women and putting them to work." Her address, as President of the Union, is equal in length and number of subjects discussed, to the message usually sent to Congress by the President of our Nation. A mere resume of it occupied nearly six pages of the Union Signal.

While we may not endorse all that is said and done by our noble sisters, yet we admire their faith and heroism and doubt not they are doing a grand work in educating the public sentiment of our nation and of the world upon the greatness of the sin of the liquor traffic and of many other evils that curse our race.

Brother Lambuth writes us that light is breaking, and there is now every prospect that the debt, the burdensome missionary debt, that has well nigh crushed more than one missionary, and has kept the light of God's work from hundreds who sit in darkness, will be removed by the 31st of March, 1893. A brother was skeptical as to Virginia endorsing the plan; but here comes a telegram from Bishop Hendrix at Lynchburg, Va., announcing that at a parlor meeting $2,500 was readily subscribed. Surely the Lord is in the movement.

This prompts us to remind our friends who subscribed to this cause at our last conference, to help pay our share of the debt, that the time for payment will be here ere we are aware of it. Let each one be ready, and if possible, send the amount before hand to our conference treasurer, A. G. Clarke, Helena, Mont., to be forwarded to T. B. Holt, treasurer of the Parent Board, at Nashville. Be sure to state for what purpose the money is given, so that it may be kept separate from the regular collections. Thus far $15 have been reported on this account from our conference. W. M. Britt, $10; and William Beall, $5. Who will be the next? The Montana Conference was the first to promise its share of the amount; let us be the first to report every dollar paid into the treasury.

It was a pleasure to meet with Rev. W. S. Bell at the Sunday-school convention. He is the superintendent of the work of the Congregational church in the State of Montana, and a plain, earnest, broad minded, practical Christian man. In his sketch of the Sunday-school work of the State, he took occasion to say that the state convention held at Bozeman was one of the best and most (if not the most) successful that had yet been held. He took pleasure in ascribing the success largely to the earnestness and activity of Rev. A. C. Couey, of the M. E. Church, South, now in Tennessee, and whose departure from the State he much regretted. Our brother in his far-away home will be glad to know that he is so kindly remembered by those not connected directly with our own church.

At the late S. S. convention Rev. A. D. Raleigh, the president, stated before the large audience assembled that in a recent conversation between Senator Sanders of Montana, and himself upon the question of the liquor traffic, the Senator stated that while he did not endorse the organization of a third party, yet he believed the only way to manage it was by prohibition. We doubt not that there are many others in high positions who are of the same opinion. One of these days they will have the courage of their convictions and there will be another "land-slide," one that will well nigh dry up this ocean of iniquity that is engulfing annually so many thousands of the fair sons of our land. May the Lord hasten the day.

Thanksgiving services were held at the Presbyterian church in Corvallis, where Rev. L. L. Wood, of the Baptist church, preached a very appropriate sermon suggested by the passage of Scripture in Eph. 4th chapter and 6th verse. Some of the thoughts were: That gratitude, thankfulness, is the normal condition of the soul that is in harmony with its Creator, and is necessary to the highest degree of usefulness. It is not the mere gratification of our desires and appetites, not the grunt of satisfaction given by the swine, but of an infinitely higher type. Thankfulness comes of trial. It inspires charity for others. True gratitude is inspired by, and inspires love to, God. The soul that is not grateful cannot love others. There was more true love and gratitude among the Puritan fathers, with their blue laws, whipping posts, etc., notwithstanding their narrowness in many things, than under the lavender kid and in the sickly sentimentalism of modern times. There was much in the Greek worship of old that was refined and beautiful and pleasing, but there was no true love to God in it, no love to man, and it went to naught. Let us be truly grateful in the midst of our festivities and may these thoughts increase our joys and strengthen and equip us for the duties of the coming year.

The people of Corvallis were favored with two Thanksgiving dinners, and suppers, or rather with the privilege of eating dinner and supper, and paying for it, at two places. One by the ladies of the Presbyterian, and the other by those of the Disciple church. They were both fairly well patronized, and the day spent pleasautly by a goodly number of our citizens. This is to some extent, an innovation upon the old custom, we believe, which was to have the feast and family reunions under the old roof-tree at home. But that was before the day of the increase of church sociables and catch-penny contrivances!

The W. C. T. U. Convention at Denver was fairly flooded with congratulatory telegrams from prominent personages throughout the land. One from the District of Columbia simply referred to a passage in the first chapter of Joshua, beginning thus: "There shall not be any man able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." Ordinarily these words would attract no special attention, but to those accustomed to stress so loudly the "vassalage" and "degradation" inflicted upon the fair sex by the liege lords of creation, and who are "groaning and travailing together in pain" waiting for the redemption that is to come, they must have a meaning and utter a prophecy that is exhilarating and inspiring to contemplate.

The great strike at Homestead has been declared off and is ended at last. The strike at one time involved nearly 10,000 men, and the loss in wages, it is said, will reach nearly $2,000,000. The Companies have lost probably twice this amount, while another half million has been required to pay the troops and cost of suits, etc. At least 35 deaths were caused directly or indirectly, by the strike. Everybody will rejoice that it has ended. May there be no occasion for another like it.

The meetings of the monetary conference at Brussels is noted with much interest. If some understanding could be reached between the different leading nations concerning the relation of gold and silver as money it would hasten the solution of the question as to a circulating medium.

While we rejoice that there is good sense, grace and womanly modesty and true refinement among the noble women of Montana sufficient to prevent one of them from consenting to pose as a model for a silver statue to grace the Montana exhibit at the World's Fair at Chicago, we sincerely regret that a theater actress has been chosen as the model, and will thus get a deal of gratis advertising. Surely "the children of this world are wise in their generation."

One of our secular contemporaries, just the other day, ridiculed the fact that a man somewhat prominent as a politician was fined for uttering profane language. Why so? If a man can be fined for a profane an indecent act, or the publication of an impure book before the world because of its corrupting influence upon the helpless and innocent, why is it a crime to restrain him from uttering profane and blasphemous language in the presence of pure women and helpless children? The effect is equally corrupting. The crime is all the greater if the perpetrator happens to be "prominent," and the credit all the more to those who enforce the law, which is simply public sentiment in statuary form. Much of this agitation about prohibition, rigid laws, etc., and this pleading for "personal liberty," is simply a plea for public license.

HOMELY HINTS.

Do you want a revival in your church, brother layman? Then, pray earnestly, work faithfully, trust God fully, live righteously and refrain from criticisms of your pastor's methods until after the meeting. Let the whole church follow the above common sense advice and the revival will have come, and come to stay.

Fault-finding, and captious criticisms are so easy. Christian charity and holy helpfulness are so hard for the average Christian. Lord, give us the latter, and remove far from us, and forever from us, the former.

Infidelity never dried a tear, or furnished balm for a wounded heart. Christianity has comforted its millions. Infidelity pulls down, Christianity builds up and upward. The one damns. The other saves. "Oh, Lord, save thy people!"

Would you feel the thrill of joy that comes from the consciousness of duty done, and service rendered, go and help somebody to find Jesus, and you will get just that blessing.

Subscribe for the METHODIST. There is a blessing in the act, and in the paper. Try it and you will find it to be true.

The Fox and the Ducks.

A FABLE.

A fox had made his den in a forest near a river, close by the haunts of some wild ducks, upon which he thought he should make many an excellent meal.

At first he was in the habit of pursuing them whenever he saw them out of the water; but he soon found that this mode of warfare would not do any good, for though the ducks were awkward runners, yet when they made use of their wings they soon got out of reach of the fox, and plunging into the river, placed themselves at safe distance from the enemy.

"This won't do," said the fox; "I must try some other means if I am ever to capture any of my feathered neighbors." So one morning he addressed himself to an old duck, who was swimming at a little distance from the shore.

"Good morning, Mrs. Duck," said he; "how charmingly you swim! It is quite a pleasure to watch you. You glide and turn and float with so much more elegance than the swans, with their long awkward throats. I give you my hearty thanks for the treat you are giving me."

The old duck arched her neck, she dived, and rose again, she fluttered, she puffed out her feathers, and performed all her swimming feats.

"Ah!" said the fox, "how do you manage that?—to disappear and come up again! It is truly wonderful. How do you perform that extraordinary act of diving? If I were only as clever as you, I could by it save my life if the hounds should come upon me near the river."

Again and again the old duck dived, and each time the fox called out:

',Charming! delightful! most graceful!"

Then he drew nearer to the edge of the water.

"Do come closer," he said, "that I may take note of each movement accurately. If you would dive from the bank, for instance, I could then copy your evolutions, and after a few attempts I might be able to do it myself, though of course very awkwardly."

So the foolish duck placed herself on the bank.

"Now," said she, preparing to make a plunge, and expecting the fox to do the same.

But Reynard, instead of making a plunge into the river, sprang at the foolish duck, and caught her before she reached the water.

Poor duck! she had not even time to repent her folly in listening to the flattery of the fox.

"Ah!" said the fox, meditatively, as he was dining upon the ill-fated bird, "it is a pity when people believe all the fine things that are said to them!"—Selected.

Review of Fourth Quarter.

FROM HURLBUT'S NOTES.

HOME READINGS.

MONDAY, (December 12), Saul's conversion, Acts 9:1–9; TUESDAY, Dorcas raised to life, Acts 9:26-43; WEDNESDAY, Peter's vision, Acts 10: 9–20; THURSDAY, Peter at Cesarea, Acts 10:34–43; FRIDAY, Peter delivered from prison, Acts 12:1–11; SATURDAY, Paul's first missionary sermon, Acts 13:26–39; SUNDAY, Work among the Gentiles, Acts 14: 8–22.

LESSON HINTS.

I. The study of the PLACES in this quarter is suggestive. The lessons begin and end in Jerusalem, but they embrace a wide circuit of localities. Call attention to them on the map, and as each is pointed out, let the facts connected with it in the quarter's lessons be stated.

1. JERUSALEM. From this place Saul started on his errand as a persecutor. Here Peter was set free from Herod, and here the apostolic council met to give liberty to the Gentile disciples. It is the "capital of Bible history."

2. JOPPA. Here Dorcas was raised to life and Peter beheld his vision of "the great sheet let down from heaven."

3. CESAREA. This place is notable as the spot where Cornelius, the centurion, the first Gentile Christian, received the Gospel from the lips of Peter and the Spirit from on high.

4. DAMASCUS. Near this city Saul of Tarsus saw the Saviour, and was convicted; and in this city he was converted and baptized.

5. ANTIOCH, the northern capital of Syria, was the first city where Jews and Gentiles were mingled in fellowship, and whence the first missionaries went forth to preach to the heathen.

6. On the ISLAND OF CYPRUS Paul and Barnabas began their missionary work, overcame the opposition of the sorcerer Elymas, and won to Christ the governor Sergius Paulus.

7. At ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA, PAUL preached his first missionary sermon on record.

8. At LYSTRA Paul was first worshiped and then stoned.

II. The important PERSONS of the lessons may also be briefly noticed.

1. PAUL is the central figure in these lessons; converted to Christ, preaching in Antioch, and going forth as a missionary to Asia Minor.

2. ANANIAS, of Damascus, a humble disciple, was the human helper in the conversion of Saul.

3. DORCAS was the godly woman of Joppa, active in good works, raised to life by the apostle Peter.

4. PETER was the leader of the apostles, who restored to strength Eneas, raised to life Dor-cas, and preached the Gospel to the first Gentile believer.

5. CORNELIUS, the Roman captain, was an earnest seeker after God, and the first Gentile to receive the Spirit and be recognized as a member of the Christian Church.

6. BARNABAS was a generous, liberal-minded disciple, who aided to broaden the apostolic Church, and to bear the Gospel to the Gentiles.

7. James, the brother of the Lord Jesus, was a zealous Jew, but at the same time a believer in Jesus, and willing to open the door of faith to the Gentiles.

III. In each quarter may be found a CENTRAL THOUGHT which will link together all the lessons of the series. In the fourth quarter the central topic is THE POWER OF THE GOSPEL.

LESSON I.

SAUL OF TARSUS CONVERTED.—Topic, SIN-FORGIVING POWER. The greatest triumph of the Gospel was in the salvation of "the chief of sinners." If Saul of Tarsus could be saved, then there is hope for any man.

LESSON II.

DORCAS RAISED TO LIFE.—Topic, LIFE-GIVING POWER. The power that called Dorcas out of the sleep of death can awaken souls from the death of sin into righteousness.

LESSON III.

PETER'S VISION.—Topic, PRAYER-ANSWERING POWER. The prayer of the Gentile seeker after God and the prayer of the apostles seeking light, were both answered in the direction of the Holy Spirit.

LESSON IV.

PETER AT CESAREA.—Topic, SPIRIT-BRINGING POWER. In the centurion's house at Cesarea was enacted once more the miracle of Pentecost, and the Spirit fell upon the gathered assembly, where Jews and Gentiles were of one accord in one place.

LESSON V.

THE GOSPEL PREACHED AT ANTIOCH.—Topic, HEART-UNITING POWER. The love of Christ enabled Jews and Gentiles at Antioch to overlap the walls of prejudice, and bound in generous love the church at Antioch and that in Jerusalem.

LESSON VI.

PETER DELIVERED FROM PRISON.—Topic, FREEDOM-GIVING POWER. Peter sleeping in prison was free from the fear of man, and Peter passing through the iron gate was free from the power of enemies.

LESSON VII.

THE FIRST CHRISTIAN MISSIONARIES.—Topic, SOUL-SEEKING POWER. The impulse which actuated Paul and Barnabas, the first missionaries, was the love for souls. They sought for men, Jews and Gentiles alike, that they might bring them to Christ.

LESSON VIII.

PAUL'S FIRST MISSIONARY SERMON.—Topic, GOSPEL-PROCLAIMING POWER. In Paul's first sermon we find the unfolding of the New Testament, though as continued in the Old Testament. Christ is presented the central figure of the whole Bible, and salvation its theme.

LESSON IX.

THE APOSTLES TURNING TO THE GENTILES.—Topic, SOUL COVNERTING POWER. While Jews reject and fight against the Gospel Gentiles accept it and are converted.

LESSON X.

WORK AMONG THE GENTILES.—Topic, LIGHT-GIVING POWER. The darkened heathen at Lystra were ready to see in Paul and Barnabas divine beings in the likeness of men; but through the Gospel their eyes were opened, and they were led to see God in the face of Jesus Christ

LESSON XI.

THE APOSTOLIC COUNCIL.—Topic, WORLD-CONQUERING POWER. At last the Gospel rides over every barrier, and is now recognized as the inheritance of the whole world.

Pictures From Life.

BY TIMOTHY HAY.

I.

A BRIGHT-EYED BOY.

A weary looking woman who smiles fondly as the boy says: "Mother, a few years more, then you won't have to work so hard. When I'm a man I'll take care of you and Nellie."

Hopeful Edward! May thy summer of manhood be as rich with ripened grain as thy springtime is beautiful with the blossoms of promise!

II.

"Come, Ned, don't be mean. All the other clerks visit here and I know you don't want to appear odd and countrified. Come in just this once"—and the homesick boy, who had but one week before left the loving presence of mother and sister, entered for the first time the gilded den of the monster which was to tempt him to destruction. A glass is pressed into his hand, he hesitates a moment, then raises the cup. Devils shout in triumph and pitying angels bow their heads and weep at the sight.

III.

Two years later. A blear-eyed, harassed looking youth is summoned to the presence of his employer. "Edward, I no longer need your services; you must look elsewhere."

Alas! for the poor widow in the cottage on the distant prairie, who loves and trusts her boy as only a mother can, and, alas! for the wretched slave who seeks forgetfulness under the lowering wing of the vulture already feasting upon his life.

IV.

Another year has passed. The work of destruction has been rapid as sure. A man starts up from the wretched bed in the garret where he lies. "Mother, did you call? Yes, mother, I'm coming." But these visions of home and mother soon give place to terrible monsters which spring upon him and dart their fiery tongues into his very brain. Vile serpents writhe and crawl about him, and without a friend to breathe a prayer for the parting soul, his sun goes down at noon and sets in the blackness of despair.

V.

A grave in the paupers' field, overgrown with briers and weeds. Two women find the place just as the twilight closes round. One, with grief too great for utterance, bows her white head to the soil above that neglected grave and moans, "My son! my son! would God I could have died for thee!"

The other looks up into the eyes of the holy stars coming out in the heavens, and prays with one hand raised to the skies and the other resting upon the grave of him whose voice had once mingled with her own as they lisped their prayer at the mother's knee: "O, God! the blood of our murdered brothers calls to Thee for vengeance, from the ground." How long shall this giant —Rum—lure Thy wandering children to the region where light never enters?"

—o—

He Sitteth upon the Flood.

"The Lord sitteth upon the flood: yea, the Lord sitteth king forever." (Psalm 29:10.) Whenever you have a flood of troubles remember that you will not have to bear them alone. They are all ministers of good, or God would not have permitted them to come. Though the storm may rage, find comfort in the thought that God is still on the throne, and that all things happen either by his direction or permission. While God reigns nothing that is not for their good can come to any of his children. No matter about the pitching of the waves, the sea cannot harm the disciples while their Master is in the ship. Learn to have confidence in God, and find out how to lie down and sleep in sweet peace, no matter whether you see his hand or not. If angels are ever sad it must be when they see God's children groaning and worrying about things they can't help. Believe in the goodness, presence and protection of God in spite all things. The only dark moments the Christian can have are those when he forgets that God is good.—Ram's Horn.

What Liquor Papers are Saying.

WHO ARE CRIMINALS?—The National Temperance Advocate says: "Let the liquor seller be branded by law as a criminal, and any party, or any candidate, presuming publicly to support and defend him, be relentlessly consigned to political oblivion." Before branding the liquor seller as a criminal the "Advocate" will, of course, have the grace to release him from the payment of heavy taxes on goods he manufactures and sells, and furthur from the senseless excise fee levied upon him for license to sell goods previously taxed. And at the same time the political economists of the "Advocate" will provide other sources of revenue for the Government, National, State and Municipal, to replace the very considerable amount now received from this source.—Sel.

Married.

Mr. John D. Byrd and Miss Anna B. Burch, near Darby, Nov. 24, 1892, Rev. T. W. Flowers officiating.

Also: Mr. J. D. Miser and Miss Cora J. Wilkerson, near Darby in Upper Bitter Root Valley, Montana, November 27th, 1892, by Rev. T. W. Flowers.

The preacher traveled nearly forty miles through the cold wind and snow to render the above efficient service; but was doubtless amply compensated for his labor by the feast of fat things furnished at two splendid wedding dinners, and by the consciousness of having made happy the hearts of two young couples. The man who is able and would not pay a preacher liberally for such service ought not to have a wife. Judging from the smile on Bro. Flowers' face upon his return, he must have been both well feed and well fed.

FIELD NOTES.

—Rev. T. C. Adkins writes from Pendleton, Ore.: The work here is moving along slowly. Father Howard had a severe accident happen him some two weeks ago. He fell from a porch and fractured his hip. He is getting along very well.

—Rev. T. W. Flowers reports good congregations at Darby at his last appointment there. Bro. F. has rented a house in Grantsdale, and expects to move there without delay. He requests us to say that his post office address is changed from Stevensville to Grantsdale, Montana.

—The good news comes that Bro. Goulder is in the midst of a splendid meeting at Willow Creek, "the best that has been held there for years." Praise the Lord. May it become wide and deep, and abide.

—Rev. W. O. Waggener closed his meeting at Olford's school house on account of unfavorable weather, and is now laying siege to the enemy's camp at Victor. A good house at Corvallis last week.

—We are delighted to hear the good report of the work at Deer Lodge. The plan of Sunday School work in operation there is most excellent.

Let all of our preachers and Sunday School workers adopt it. Get the names of children and adults in homes isolated from the centers; furnish them with magazines and other literature; get them enlisted and great good will follow.

From Deer Lodge.

My Dear Bro. Stanley:—Enclosed please find six dollars ($6.00) for which credit the subscriptions of Mrs. M. B. Evans and myself to Oct. 1893.

We have just closed a very interesting meeting here. Several bright conversions, with an abiding presence of the Lord.

The meeting was discontinued on account of our pastor's poor health. He contracted a severe cold and was unable to carry on the work. At present, however, he is better, and we hope he will soon be entirely recovered.

The Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission Society is doing fair work here, more, however, of Home Mission than of Parsonage work.

Our committees are faithful to the sick, poor and needy, as well as the strangers. Through their influence the Sunday School has grown much stronger, and several have been added to the church membership.

We have established what we call an "Associate Membership of the Sunday School," to which belong all who are unable to attend the school, but who wish to keep up the study of our lessons. We find it profitable and interesting.

Again urging the women of our society to deep earnest work, and, asking the prayers of the whole church in our behalf, I remain Yours in the work,

Margaret H. Evans.

From Denver, Col.

Sister Morrison, wife of the late Rev. A. A. Morrison, D. D., while writing about some friends of ours, who had recently moved to Denver, and whom we had requested her to look after, adds the following which will be of interest to our readers:

I get a number of your paper from Bro. Duncan, or Needham, once in awhile. I have not had a paper through the post office for years—never did get it regularly, tho I paid for it I think, two years. I have always felt as great interest in your work up there as here, and always glad to hear what is going on. I have always had the St. Lonis and Nashville Advocates. I get some Montana news from them. Glad you are doing so well. Our work here is not as prosperous as I would like to see. But I feel hopeful. We are delighted with Bro. Duncan and Bro. Sherwood, they are both superior men and good preachers. We hope for a gracious revival. Our prayer is "Lord, send more laborers to this part of thy heritage." We need them in every department especially in our Sunday Schools. Love to you and yours, to Bro. Britt, and all the preachers I may know there.

[Sister Morrison is one of the pioneers and pillars of our church in Denver. We can never forget how we were refreshed in that delightful Christian home where we attended the first session of the Denver Conference, during the lifetime of the gifted Dr. Morrison, in 1874. We are surprised to learn that she is not getting the "Methodist," as the name is on the copy of the mailing list that was turned over to us when we took charge of the paper, and we never took it off. We shall see that it is replaced, and that from henceforth our sister will hear every week how the battle progresses in the Northwest. May choisest blessings rest upon this venerable mother in Israel and upon the cause that lies so near her heart.—Ed.]

Island City, Ore.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—What is the matter with our little "Methodist?" Are you "froze up," or "snowed under?" I have not received a copy since conference and I miss it greatly. It has a place side by side with our great "Nashville." We are now settled in our home, and are very comfortably fixed. It is wonderful how easily I adopted myself to housekeeping.

Our work moves along smoothly, but O, how closely we need to keep to our blessed Master. I pray that our whole church, and especially our Northwest conferences may be baptized with the Holy Spirit and receive such unction from on high that scores of souls may be saved. May the Lord help us as preachers to so declare the "whole counsel of God" that this result may be realized. Amen. May the "Methodist" be a powerful factor in the grand work. May the Lord bless and direct the faithful men who edit our papers and send them forth as messengers of truth and light, bringing cheer and encouragement to our many homes.

P. M. Bell.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Cheering News From Nashville.

Dear Brother Stanley:—Cheering news is coming to us from all along the line. Every conference so far has cordially accepted the amount distributed to it for the payment of the missionary debt. The S. W. Mo. Conference assuming $1,000. More than was asked. A telegram from Bishop Hendrix, a day or two ago, told of $2 500 pledged at a parlor meeting in Lynchburg, Va. To-day, a letter from Dr. John, now in attendance upon his own conference, brings us the good news that the "Old Texas" has pledged the whole amount asked for the debt, and also undertaken again the support of its missionary in China, Rev. J. L. Hendry.

Not only are the home conferences rallying to the work of paying the debt by March 31st, 1893, but from the mission fields are coming in gifts which represent hard work and self-denial. Mrs. Wainwright and Miss Strider, two of our missionary ladies in Japan, have sent $100 each to be paid on the missionary debt. One of these ladies made her money by teaching in a government school, under very trying circumstances; the other lost all she had in the burning of the girls' school at Hiroshima, last year. In the same mail with these rich gifts, came $11, one from each child in the Japan Mission. God bless the children.

I am profoundly convinced that God is in this movement. Let us bend all our energies to its advancement, and the debt will be paid by March 31st, 1893, and the Board of Missions be free to answer the thrilling appeals for help that are coming from every field.

I shall be glad to hear from you of the progress of the movement in your own conference. May God bless and guide you in all you are doing for His cause.

Cordially,
W. R. Lambuth.

From Pine City, Wash.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—I have purposed in my heart to write you long ere this, but procrastination, that thief on whom is laid a great deal of stealing in the world, has also been stealing my time. I know this is satisfactory to you, as you also are both a busy and a married man.

Since conference we have been "teaching the young idea," &c. Our general health is better somewhat; yet we still feel that it will be best for us to go to the "Sunny Southland," and, D. V., we leave December 19th, for Georgia.

Wife and I are both desirous of the success of the Church in the great "North-West," and have the utmost confidence in its future in this needy country.

We love the work here, and some of our dearest interests are centered here, and many things to draw us back, if God shall so lead.

We attended the first quarterly conference of this circuit, the 12th and 13th. Bro. Swift preached the best sermon we ever heard from him.

Being among the people, and having been a pastor awhile, we have learned somethings that we did not know a few years before.

Some people there are, who think our preachers should work by the day and preach to them also. It is a crying shame the way some of our "boys" are not supported. This field is largely kept up by money sent from the East, by people who are poorer than those here. The idea of a man who makes two to three thousand bushels of wheat, and more, only paying $5 or $10 for the support of the ministry.

The people in the Northwest are amply able to pay handsomely, even, for the Gospel. Think of a charge with about sixty members paying their pastor $145 for a whole year's work. Such penuriousness will never stand the close scrutiny of the great and awful Judgment Day.

A preacher of our conference, after preaching one evening, presented a claim to the congregation for collection. A lady present, a professed Christian, said he "had up a good feeling, but had killed it all by naming a collection." Does she think her professions of great sanctity will be worth anything with God?

If giving to the Gospel is not religious it is nothing. With too many it is merely an ethical matter. When it should be strictly æsthetical.

God help us all to awaken on this subject, and may the day soon come when the hoarded millions of Christianity shall be placed in channels where they can bring multiplied blessings to thousands who sit in the shadow of great darkness in divers' places.

There seems to be skeletons in so many homes, where they are least expected. Nothing but the Gospel of Jesus Christ can make the hearts in our homes the beautifully harmonize and ring with the melodies of Heaven's symphonies. "Let them first learn to show piety at home."

Parents sow and children reap. The piety of the children take its coloring from that of the father and mother. If they are spasmodic, worldly, frivolous in religious matters, the son and daughter will be likewise. "As is the mother, so are the daughters." This is not chance, but an absolute unalterable fact. So many mothers whom we meet are really skeptical in regard to God's Word. And how few of them are ever seen lovingly, poring over its well-thumbed pages? No wonder we have such weaklings in the Kingdom of God. The boy is father to the man. You can easily cast a horoscope of his future, without consulting the stars. More Anon. As ever.

Fred St. Clair.

From the Land of Flowers.

MR. EDITOR:—I trust that a few lines, from the land of oranges, pineapples, and big persimmons, will not "clog the hungry edge of appetite with bare imagination of the feast."

Take your map and direct your eye to the land of flowers. Near the central part of the state you will notice two very fine lakes forming an isthmus about one and a half miles wide. These lakes are fringed with water-lilies, bordered with rich hammocks, extensive orange and lemon groves. Ltke Harris, the larger one of these lakes, covers an area of about ninty square miles, and abounds in various kinds of eatable fish. Formerly huge alligators were numerous and could often be seen stretched out upon the sunny shores, with jaws agope to catch the festive gnat or the obtrusive mosquito; but the Yankee enterprise has gobbled up the monster and left the gnats and mosquitoes in their glory. A few years ago Bishop Hendrix sailed upon the bosom of this beautiful lake, and is reported to have said that it reminded him of the Sea of Galilee, about which clusters so many hallowed Christian associations.

Lake Griffin is not as large as Lake Harris, but is a beautiful body of water surrounded by oranges groves.

Situated on the narrow neck of land that separates the two lakes, is the beautiful and enterprising town of Leesburg, with its fifteen hundred inhabitants and its numerous orange and lemon groves surrounding and penetrating it.

The people of Leesburg are quiet, moral, and intelligent. In regard to religion it is certainly a noted place. There are four very comfortable churches, of different denominations, the M. E. Church, South, being the strongest. It is a rare thing indeed to enter the house of worship at service time and not find the seats all occupied. Rev. J. F. Martial is our pastor, and he is very much loved by every one.

We also have a grand Sunday-school, which is doing a great work. Prof. Taylor, formerly of Mo., is our superintendent. We have a regular attendance of about 140 persons. It should be noted too, that these congregations are made up of the best elements of the town and community. There is hardly a business man that is not a member of some church and does not help to support the gospel. There is also a very interesting prayer-meeting, having a large attendance. And the Epworth League is firmly planted, we think. Besides these, are several other religious societies. Among them are, The Orange Blossom, Parsonage Aid, Home Missionary Society and Woman's Prayer-meeting. The Florida Conference College is established here and growing rapidly. The new building was finished just in time for this session to open in it. Besides the college, Leesburg has a good public school and a high school, either of which may be highly recommended. The Florida Christian Advocate is published here.

We have no saloons. Public opinion is too healthy to tolerate such a den of shame and death. [Thank the Lord for that.—Editor.]

I might say much of the soil, climate, and productiveness of this portion of the state, but those of your readers who have not visited our country, perhaps would not appreciate it, and I will not take much space for these subjects. Our autumns, winters, and springs cannot be surpassed, I think. Last winter there were but three or four frosts, and it is said that it was colder than is common. The summers are long and warm; though not so intensely hot as it is in some parts of the North; but much longer. Owing to the seabreeze, it is not extremely warm here, as is supposed by many who have never been here.

The soil is very sandy; indeed, it is almost sand without any soil; but if properly fertilized and cultivated it is productive.

There is, probably, no part of the world so healthful as this. I have been hear a year and have not known of a case of fever, nor any contagious diseases. The yellow fever is not dreaded so much here as by some people who are entirely free from it.

But Florida with all its beauties and advantages is not as desirable and homelike a place, according to my judgement, as the "Far North West." Many others think differently, however. Some come here and are delighted; others are disappointed and disgusted.

So, as there are many different countries and climates, there are also many different opinions.

I regret that I could not attend the conference held in Palouse City, Wash., this fall; but hope to be there before an other conference is held in that place. It is with much pleasure that I often think of the visit you made at our home there a year and a half ago, and am sorry that I was not there this fall.

Glad to see in your paper that Bro. Compton is still on that work.

Yours Truly,

Lillie Randolph.

Leesburg, Fla., Nov. 18, 1892.

Washington Letter.

How did it happen? has been generally discussed, and now it is "what will the Democrats do?" It happened because they had the most votes. That is an easy one, and time will make clear the answer to the other question. Will Cleveland clear out all the Republicans? Will he call an extra session? On the first point there is less anxiety among the Republican clerks than eight years ago, Cleveland's conservatism as to all positions now in the classified service being considered as a practical guaranty against sweeping dismissals Besides many of his appointees have continued to hold office through Harrison's administration.

EXTRA SESSION. Opinion is much divided as to the early assembling of the new Congress. On one side it is urged that the people having emphatically condemned the McKinley bil and put the Democrats in power they should at once repeal the robber tariff. On the other hand it is urged that it will take some time to get the new administration in running order, that it will be wise to make haste slowly and that a sudden and abrupt change will unnecessarily disturb the business situation. Mr. Cleveland is likely to keep his own counsel, and we may not know what he purposes to do until next March, but it is the more general opinion here that he will not call an extra session.

FREE FISH. The Government distributes, seeds, Congressional speeches, and fish to the people without money and without price. Just at this time the Fish Commission is draining Uncle Sam's carp ponds situated between the White House and the Washington monument and sorting out finger length yearlings for shipment. They are put by fifties in two gallon cans and many tens of thousands are thus distributed. Trout, shad and other of the less hardy varieties require aerated water and greater care, but the carp will endure a journey of several days without change of water and thrive thereafter in almost any pond or stream. The Potomac was stocked with them a few years since by a freshet which washed Pennsylvania Avenue from the Treasury to the Capitol and emptied the fish breeding ponds, and carp are now freely caught weighing fifteen to twenty pounds or more. Washingtonians have salt and fresh watar fish of all varieties in great abundance and do not seem to relish these importations from the Danube. But it is said that when properly cooked they are equal to the best. They may be less than that and yet well worth propagation. We can not long keep the trout, bass, pickeral and other timid and fastidious game fish. If their original haunts are not dried up by the destruction of forests, nor depopulated by the constant whipping of twenty times too many fishermen, they are apt to be thickened with saw dust, sewerage or residual chemicals. These carp live any where and illustrate the survival of the fittest. If you wish to stock your pond send to the U. S. Commission for a blank application, get the endorsement of a Congressman and in due time receive a consignment of the hardy prolific, vegetarian carp. CAPITAL.

The Holy Spirit.

BY REV. A. E. KITTREDGE, D. D.

Talking is never going to convert souls, nothing but the power of the Spirit can do that. I believe in prayer meetings. When Jesus spoke His farewell words to His disciples He told them it was expedient that He should go away, that his personal presence was not to be compared to the presence of the Comforter. He told them also to tarry in Jerusalem till the power from on high should come upon them. What did they need? Peter felt quite ready to go out and preach. He knew enough, he had been years in company with the Lord, had seen Him, felt Him, ate with Him, what more did he need? Jesus said, "Wait for the Holy Spirit." There was nothing particularly striking in Peter's sermon on the day of Penecost. It was just the kind or sermon we would expect a plain, blunt fisherman to deliver. I believe that if Peter were a candidate for a pulpit to-day, and preached that sermon, he would never get a call. And yet through it there were three thousand souls converted. In every instance where Peter and Paul and Phillip preached, the Holy Spirit came with power, except once, and that was when Paul preached to a church that had never been told that there was a Holy Spirit, and on his praying the Holy Spirit came.

Take church history up to the third century, it is one long list of revivals. Then paganism, which was the ruling power, gave way to Christianity, but just as Christianity gained in worldly power it lost, in spiritual power till it ceased almost to have any. But bursting through this darkness came the dawn of Luther's reformation. True, it wast a doctrinal reformation, its creed was "justification through faith." At the beginning of this century there were two awful facts confronting this nation. First, dissipation was rampant; and second, infidelity and atheism were almost universal. There was hardly a public man in office who was not either an infidel or an atheist. In Yale College there was but one Christian out of two hundred and seventy-five students; in Bowdoin there were three, and in William and Mary College there was not one. The stream of that day was downward. If that state of affairs had kept on till now, where would we be? In this country, more than in any other, where the people are the rulers, where we have no standing army to force us, no throne to check us, the government cannot long stand on a corrupt foundation, and the moment its morals are gone it begins to go down. In the year 1803, Christians in England and America began to pray for an outpouring of the Spirit's power. The revival commenced in England, and coming over here the awful wave of social corruption was driven back before the tens of thousands of converts. It was this revival that gave birth to the boards of home and foreign missions, to the Bible societies and to the Sunday school. This country owes her existence to the revival of 1804. In 1857, '58 and '59 there was another great revival. Men's minds were so turned to religion that business was almost entirely suspended. The question on everyone's lips was "What must I do to be saved?" At twelve o'clock Wall street, where our busy financiers gather was one mass of people, stretching down Broadway almost as far as the eye could reach and all singing the grand old Doxology, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." What was it? God's power!

All the shouting that Joshua and the children of Israel could do round the walls of Jericho, would never have pulled the walls down; but Joshua stood on God's own word and was successful. Let us take that promise, "Bring ye all the tithes into the store-house, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it" (Mal. iii, 10), and plant ourselves firmly on it and a blessing will surely come.—Young Men's Era.

A Sociable Man.

Mr. Perry was an exceedingly polite and temperate man. One day he met an acquaintance who called out: "Hellow, Perry! I was just going to take a drink. Come in and take something."

"Thank you," said Perry, "I don't care for anything."

"But, persisted the other, "come in and take something just for sociability's sake."

"I want to be sociable," answered Perry. "I am anxious to be sociable, but I can't drink with you."

"All right," growled the friend. "If you don't want to be sociable, I'll go without drinking."

The two men walked silently along for a minute or two, the sociable man in a state of great irritation, until Perry suddenly halted in front of a drug store.

"I am not feeling well to-day," said he, with a pleasant smile, "and I think I'll go in here and get a dose of castor oil. Will you join me?"

"What!" exclaimed the other, "in a dose of castor oil!"

"Yes; I'll pay for it."

"Ugh," cried the sociable man, with a very wry face, "I hate the the stuff."

"But I want you to take a glass of oil with me just to be sociable, you know."

"I won't do it."

"Indeed, my friend," said Perry, gravely, "your sociable whisky is just as distasteful to me as my sociable oil is to you. Don't you think I have as much right to be offended with you as you have with me?"

The sociable man saw the point, and it would be money, health and morals saved if the lesson could be firmly implanted in the mind of every young man in the land.

Miss Willard on World's Fair Morals.

SABBATH CLOSING AND LIQUOR SELLING.

Americans must be on their guard. State legislatures, so far as they have acted at all, have ordered their State exhibits closed. Petitions to Congress against Sunday opening represent forty millions of our population. The act of Congress authorizing the Exposition requires that the laws of the State in which it is held shall be obeyed; the laws of Illinois forbid Sunday work. No International Fair conducted by English speaking people has ever opened its doors on Sunday. Out of forty-four States and five Territories, all but two have laws against Sunday toil, traffic and turmoil. At least fifty thousand employes would be necessary if the Fair were kept open.

Twenty-five thousand locomotive engineers have petitioned against Sunday opening, and numerous associations of laboring men have done the same. It is unfair to the better element of Chicago to pour in upon them hundreds of thousands of Sun day excursionists during the Exposition. The best exhibition we could make during the Exposition is the American Sabbath. It has universally been considered by our greatest statesmen from the beginning as one of the chief causes of the stability of the Republic.

This is a Christian country, and Christians are commanded to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Whatever our personal views concerning the details of this plan, we must stand solidly as an association in the emergency that faces us. We must make a general attack on State legislatures to cover their State exhibits in case the Congress does not continue (after election) to stand by Sunday closing.

Chicago, Illinois, will be the National battle ground for the next year. Every possible attempt will be made to secure from our legislation the repeal of such laws as give us a measure of protection at the World's Fair from the uprising tide of strong drink, that it is determined to break down every barrier and flow in to take possession of the great Exposition. The same effort will be made in the municipality if dram shop politicians can summon the brain or the "boodle" to bring this about. The utmost power of the W. C. T. U. should be put forth to help the gallant division of the army in Illinois, and Chicago, which have from the first "fought with the beasts at Ephesus."—Christian Herald.

OUR BROAD LAND.

Land of the prairies wide,
Washed by two oceans' tide,
Land of our birth;
Land where the mountains proud
Are often capped with cloud;
Of thee we sing aloud,
Fair clime of earth.

Land of the forest deep,
Where countless echoes sleep
Which man will wake;
Where cedar, oak and pine,
And many a wood of thine,
Fragrance and strength combine,
For us to take.

Land of the lakes and streams,
Where not the old triremes,
But steamers ply;
Lane of broad vale and mead,
Where flocks and herds now feed,
Supplying a need,
Glad'ning the eye.

Land of rich grass and grain,
Of cotton and of cane,
Of fruits and vines:
Of gold and silver bright,
Of wells of oil for light,
Of coal to cheer the night,
Of iron mines.

O glorious land of ours!
Not held by lordly towers,
Land of the free;
Land of the true and brave,
Whose shores free water lave,
God's grace for thee we crave,
We pray for thee.

EDITORIAL.

A Great Crisis.

This is a great country. Its territory extends from ocean to ocean; from Mexico to British America, and then from the British possessions to the North Pole. Rich in resources, vast and varied in industries and productions, of agriculture and mineral and pastoral wealth, it can feed its sixty millions annually, three times a day, and send food for millions across the sea. Our coast line is the finest in the world, and our varied climate suited to all classes and conditions of men. Our lakes, rivers, railroads, telegraphs and telephones furnish convenient transportation and communication, unsurpassed and unsurpassable. With her strategic position in the midst of the nations, the character of her population and the laws governing her institutions, judging by the progress made in the past, there is every prospect that America will come to be the leading nation of the world. Her laws, institutions, customs and habits will go far towards influencing the thought and life of the peoples of the earth. Already she is supposed to be the wealthiest of the nations, and her history is the wonder of the world.

The coming Columbian Exposition will mark a wonderful stride in this direction. It will undoubtedly furnish the grandest display of art and æsthetics as applied to the forces of nature in ministering to the wants of humanity ever witnessed. What an occasion for America and Americans, yea, for the peoples of all nations and climes. Having heard of our prosperity, the inhabitants of far away lands will come to study and admire and imitate what they see good in us, and possibly, alas! much that is otherwise.

But this Exposition will mark a great crisis in our history and in the history of the world. We claim to be a Christian nation. Not that Christianity is established by law, or that we hope to have a state religion of any kind. But Christian customs and sentiments have been woven into the warp and woof of our institutions, and about nine-tenths of its people are, if not communicants, at least adherents to the Christian faith. If we are true to our principles, this will afford a wonderful occasion for the dissemination of those principles that lie at the foundation of our prosperity, and which we have hoped to see prevail throughout the world. But if we are not on the alert, the devil, who deceived our first parents and robbed them of their inheritance, will cheat us out of our victory by duping us into making a league with our enemies. Already he is mustering his hordes and making a mighty struggle for supremacy. A fierce onslaught is being made on our Christian Sabbath, and an effort also to let King Alcohol have full sway over the motley multitude seven days in the week, while the anti-Christ that we have been opposing with all our might for 1,893 years, is now most courteously invited to come and sit down and take counsel with us in a "parliament of religions!" What a spectacle to behold! papan priests presiding in this "parliament," and burning paper and invoking the favor of pagan deities upon Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian "bishops and other clergy," amid the rumble of machinery, the rush of moving trains, and the revelings of open saloons—all in full blast on the Lord's day! The conduct of that great occasion will unavoidably type, in a large measure, the future life, both in our own beloved America and in other lands. Our missionaries have insisted on Sabbath observance and made uncompromising warfare upon strong drink and public vices in other countries. Will not the inhabitants of these lands laugh in our faces when they see the sins that we condemned in them, not only tolerated, but even magnified and endorsed by our highest tribunals, here in our own home, and find that the religion that we have preached to them has less influence with our people than theirs does with them?

Such will be the case if the Sabbath-hating and whiskey-drinking element is allowed to dominate the Exposition. The educating and elevating influence of the great occasion will be lost and it will degenerate into a scramble for shekels. Again we repeat that a great crisis is upon our country. Let every Christian lift up his pen and voice, and pray God to thwart the counsels and purposes of the adversaries and cause the right to triumph. There is no time to lose. What is done, must be done quickly.

News and Notes.

Our dear friend, Rev. W. M. Prottsman, D. D., still wields a facile pen. A recent issue of the "Tennessee Methodist" contained a characteristic letter from the "old man eloquent," upon the "capital execution" of the presiding elders of the Southwest Missouri Conference in the "St. Louis Advocate," which for genuine wit and a general overflow of good nature, excels anything that we have read for many a day. Though the physical eyesight may be growing dim, the mental acumen remains clear and keen, and we trust that the spiritual vision will grow brighter and brighter unto the perfect day.

The "Tennessee Methodist" is one of the most wide-awake papers in our church. The aggressive editor, Rev. B. F. Haynes, who was a visitor at the Montana Conference at two different sessions several years ago, when he made many friends who remember him very kindly, is up with the times and discusses living issues in a lively way. He wields a vigorous pen. We read the "Tennessee" with interest. Long may it wave.

At a dinner recently given in his honor, President-elect Cleveland gave utterance to the following excellent sentiments:

"I should not, perhaps, introduce anything sombre on this occasion, but I know you will forgive me when I say that every feeling of jubilation and even my sense of gratitude is so tempered as to be almost entirely obscured by a realization, nearly painful, of the responsibility I have assumed in the sight of the American people. My love of country, my attachment to the principles of true democracy, my appreciation of the obligation I have entered into with the best and most confiding people in the world and a consciousness of my own weakness and imperfections, all conspire to fill my mind with sober and oppressing reflections.

"When I consider all we have to do as a party charged with the control of the government, I feel that our campaign, instead of being concluded, is but just begun. What shall our performance be of the contract we have made with our countrymen, and how well shall we justify the trust they have reposed in us? If we see nothing in our victory but a license to revel in partisan spoils we shall fail at every point. If we merely profess to enter upon our work, and if we make apparent endeavor to do it a cover for seeking partisan advantage, we shall invite contempt and disgrace.

"If we attempt to discharge our duty to the people without complete party harmony in patriotic action we shall demonstrate our incompetency. I thank God that far above all doubts and misgivings and away beyond all difficulties we may constantly see the lights of hope and safety.

Be Not Deceived.

The arch-deceiver is on the alert, and our young people must be on their guard lest they be entrapped into a compromise of their religious principles. A sociable was announced and invitations sent to nearly all the young people in the country round about. As the impression was made that there would be no dancing, many of the church members consented to go. But on arriving at the place they found that there was not only dancing, and that it was not simply the chief amusement, but that it was the ONLY entertainment (beside the excellent supper at midnight) provided. The only alternative was to go into the dance-hall or go home. Such treatment, though possibly not so intended, is, to say the least of it, most discourteous to every professing Christian who is known to be opposed to that kind of amusement. It is strange that people will act so. But we have known them actually turn a church sociable—gotten up for the benefit of a preacher—into a dance. Our young people, and older ones, too, for that matter, must have the courage to resent such indignities. While they should be kind and courteous to all, yet let the world know that they have rights, feelings and principles that must be respected. If a number of religious people were invited to spend a social evening in a Christian home, and after the guests had all arrived, the occasion were turned into a prayer-meeting or class-meeting, it would be considered the height of impoliteness, and so it would be. The same is true when an ordinary social gathering is turned into a dance. It is right to be sociable. It is natural for young people to seek social enjoyment. But let an effort be made to choose recretions that all—those who are religious and those who are not—can conscientiously engage in. Then all will be happier and better off in the end. But if people will do nothing but fiddle and dance and play at cards, then let Christians come out from among them and touch not the unclean thing. Let them seek amusements that will cultivate their heads and hearts, rather than their heels and fit them for the best and purest society of this world and of the one to come.

Jay Gould, the great railroad magnate and money-king, died at his home in New York, December 2, of pulmonary consumption. While the world at large will not mourn, yet the grief in that palace-home is just as great for father and friend as if it were only a humble cottage. Wealth and fame cannot ward off the blows of the fell destroyer. The deceased made his start in life as a common farmer boy. He was born at Roxbury, N. Y., May 27, 1836. He early developed a genius for business and money-making. At his death he controlled 3000 miles of rail road and his fortune is estimated at from $80,000,000. to $125,000,000. It is thought his death will make but little change in the money market, as the son, George, who possesses fine business qualities, will have charge of his father's affairs.

A convention was recently held at New Orleans in the interest of the Nicaragua canal enterprise. The completion of this canal would shorten the water route from one side of the continent to the other 10,000 miles, would cheapen transportation, increase our commerce, and greatly benefit our country. We would rejoice to see it completed and controlled in some way by our great country. Let the work go forward.

Dr. S. A. Steel, the eloquent preacher and earnest pastor of McKendree M. E. Church, South, Nashville, Tenn., is being assisted in revival services by Rev. H. C. Morrison, of Ky. Prof. C. C. Case conducts the singing. Brother Steel says that his heart is breaking and he is praying and working with all his might for an old fashioned revival at McKendree. If the entire membership would catch the fire that seems to be burning in the pastor's heart there will be such a revival as Nashville has never seen before. Lord send it and extend it into the regions beyond, even to the mountains and valleys of Montana.

The crop report sent out by the Agricultural Department at Washington for November gives the potato yield—the average—per acre at 62 bushels against 92 last year and 57.5 in 1890. The late crop was injured by drought, and there is marked tendency toward rot. In the Rocky Mountain region the yield is better, but for below that of last year. The average yield of hay per acre is 1.17 tons, about the same as in '91. The cotton crop is very light.

We notice that Rev. A. C. Couey was chosen to preach the Thanksgiving sermon at the union service held on that day in McMinnville, Tenn.

Bishop W. H. Miles, of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, died at his home in Louisville Ky. the 14th of November. He is said to have been the pioneer in the work of organizing that church. He was once a slave, but was always fond of books. Mainly through study at home he acquired the knowledge of books that enabled him to become one of the leading theologians among the colored people. He was 65 years old, and had been preaching 40 years. The writer heard him at St. Joseph, Mo. in 1874, during the session of the Mo. Conference. It was at three o'clock on Sunday, at Tenth Street Church. Curiosity had crowded the house with whites, preachers in particular. This somewhat abashed the preacher at first, but he soon found that his audience was in a responsive mood and really wanted him to succeed. This gave him courage. It was soon evident that he had points, and when he began to make them, his audience took courage. The preacher began to take fire. His subject was hope. The last five or ten minutes of his sermon, in which he spoke of the realization of the Christian's hope—"When the half-wrecked mariner, crossing the dark river turns his eyes heavenward and catches sight of the New Jerusalem and the convoy of angels that comes to carry him home," was a fine a specimen of burning and soul stirring eloquence as we had ever heard. At first his audience held him up, but at the last he held them in triumph up to the very city of God, yea, to the great white throne in the midst thereof. The effect was wonderful. The preacher was so happy that he came down from the pulpit to greet a few friends on the front seats, and it seemed that everybody wanted to shake hands and bid him God speed. Brother R. N. T. Holliday sat near us, and he laughed and cried and his strong frame shook with emotion. A collection was taken for the school for the education of colored ministers, and the coins fairly rained into the basket. There was not one there that day who will ever forget the occasion. The good bishop is gone in person, but his work goes on, and will go on and on and ever on. Peace to his ashes.

Evangelical Alliance.

The week of prayer commended by the council of the Evangelical Alliance begins January 1, and ends January 8, 1893. The call suggests a review of the marvellous blessing of the past century. These are parts of the world's history; the advance of the missionary idea; the growth of the Christian fellowship, and the rapid spread of civilization. The program for 1893 services is: January 1st, sermons on "The Exalted Saviour's Gifts for Men;" January 2nd, "Humiliation and Thanksgiving;" January 3rd, "The Church Universal;" January 4th, "Nations and Their Rulers;" January 5th, "Foreign Missions;" January 6th, "Home Missions and Jews;" January 7th, "Families and Schools" January 8th, sermons on "The Promised Outpouring" and "The Plain Command."

The Sandwich Islands, within half a century, have become Christian, and stand to-day at the head of Christian activity in sending the gospel to other islands of the sea, and people tell us that missions don't pay! They don't know. The carnal mind has no perception of spiritual things.

Mr. Gladstone recently said: "The older I grow the more confirmed I am in my faith and my religion. I have been in public life fifty-eight years, and forty-seven in the Cabinet of the British government, and during those forty-seven years I have been associated with sixty of the master minds of the country, and all but five of the sixty were Christians."

Errata.

An Illinois paper says: "An item in our last issue read, 'two thousand car-loads of cats were shipped East last week.' For cats, read oats."

Bro. Hosking's letter in last ADVOCATE read "Next comes Bro. King with nothing I desire to hear." For "nothing," read "something." —Montana C. Advocate.

The above reminds us of some amusing errors that have crept into the columns of the METHODIST. Brother Couey wrote of his pleasant associations with the people of Montana "which I am not willing to forget." The types made him say, "which I am now willing to forget." They took the pith out of one of our best paragraphs by changing "Missourians" into "missionaries" and when we wrote of carrying a "needle-gun and cartridges," the naughty types put it, "a needle, gun and cartridges." Our friends thought a needle a queer weapon to carry on the war-path.

SELECTIONS.

Not Quantity But Quality.

It is a mistake for men to judge of their work by quantitative rules. What is the true measure of success in one place bears no relation to the measure of success in another. It is where God wants us and where duty places us, and not where we can reap the most sheaves, or display the most talents, that we should be willing to work. It may happen that the man who apparently accomplishes least really accomplishes most. This observation applies to our work in the West. The preaching of the Gospel here returns but meager results; but the work has reference to a future time. It gives play to the instincts of courage and the spirit of heroism. It is the opportunity of the brave.

——o——

Preaching depends very largely upon what is in the preacher. If there is a sermon in him it will come out; but if there is no sermon in him he may beat the air, strain his throat and empty the tear reservoir in vain. Watching a man in this predicament at a Sunday School mass meeting were two boys. When the preacher came to tears, one of the boys turned to the other and said: "Bill, what do you think he is crying about?" The other answered: "If you got up there to make a speech, and didn't have any more to say than he's got, you'd cry too."—Rocky Mountain Methodist.

A CHRISTMAS LESSON.

LUKE 2: 8-20.

BY REV. J. Q. A. CURRY.

INTRODUCTION. Earth's winter solstice had come. The shortest day and the longest night is at hand. The sun is farthest away from us. But there is the promise of spring, with its buds and blossoms; and summer with its rich harvest. For 4000 years the moral world had been slowly drifting away from God. Days growing shorter; nights increasing in length. The moral is,world approaching its winter solstice. But prophecy fortells a change: "The Sun of Rightousness shall rise with healing in his wings." Our lesson to-day gives an account of this rising Sun, whose brightness and glory has been increasing more and more for nearly nineteen centuries. His beneficent beams has caused "the wilderness and the solitary place to be glad for them; and the desert to rejoice and blossom as the rose." Isa. 35: 1.

I. THE HEAVENLY VISITORS

Although the home of Mary and Joseph was in Nazareth, of Galilee, they had come to Bethlehem of Judea, the home of David, of whom they were decendants, in obedience to "a decree from Caesar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed." And during their stay,Jesus was born. In the vicinity of Bethlehem's rich pasture fields were "SHEPHERDS ABIDING IN THE FIELD KEEPING WATCH OVER THEIR FLOCKS BY NIGHT." Shepherds remained with their flocks during the night. A more vigilant class of men could not be found. On the road leading to Jerusalem stood "the watch tower of the flock," where the sheep for the sacrifice was tended. It is believed among the Jews that the birth of the Messiah would be revealed from this "tower." The shepherds were suddenly startled by the appearance of "THE ANGEL OF THE LORD" AND THE GLORY OF THE LORD SHONE ROUND ABOUT THEM." Angels interested themselves very much in the early ministry of our Savior. One announced his coming to Mary. Angels ministered to him in the wilderness; comforted him in the garden; rolled the stone away from his grave; etc. "FEAR NOT." The best of men would become "SORE AFRAID" if the curtain of the unseen world were suddenly lifted. But the first word from heaven is intended to silence our fear; and the next is one of GOOD TIDINGS OF GREAT JOY." With fear dispelled and hope enkindled, their hearts are prepared to receive the sublimest message that ever greeted human ears. "UNTO YOU IS BORN THIS DAY IN THE CITY OF DAVID A SAVIOR." Where David began his reign; David's greater Son begins that kingdom that shall never be destroyed. "CHRIST THE LORD" the anointed one. David was anointed by Samuel to be king of Israel; but Christ is anointed of the Father, the KING OF GLORY. The shepherds might muse and say "Is there any palace in Bethlehem where such an event would likely occur?" But the angel continues his story: "YE SHALL FIND THE BABE.....LYING IN A MANGER." Strange contrast! What does it mean? Is is a prophecy of His future treatment? But the shepherds are not given time to unravel this strange paradox. For "suddenly there was with the angel a multiude of the heavenly host praising God." A heavenly song often lifts our souls from the simple vale of sight into the realm of faith." GLORY TO GOD IN THE HIGHEST, AND ON EARTH PEACE, GOOD WILL TOWARD MEN." This is the first song of heaven known to man, since the "morning stars sang together" at creation. The fall of man seemed to shut off those celestial anthems. But at the birth of the Savior an angelic choir delights human ears the heavenly strains. That choir has set the world to singing.

II. THE SHEPHERD'S VISIT.

How long this grand concert lasted we do not know. But long enough. We cannot be entertained by heavenly music; there is WORK to do. "LET US NOW GO.....AND SEE THIS THING WHICH IS COME TO PASS." They do not seem to have the least doubt as to the fact, but it is their privilege to go and see for themselves and thus add the testimony of their senses to that of faith. It was a comfort to them to have had a personal knowledge of Jesus. It is the privilege of every soul to have a personal knowlege of Christ the Savior. No one should wait a single moment; but like the shepherds say "let us NOW go." A day's delay may be fatal. "AND THEY CAME IN HASTE;" showing their unwavering faith and intense interest. We may well suspicion the faithfulness of those who consider the service of our blessed Master a drudgery. There was no doubt a rivalry between them as to who should get there first. Now Jesus has pledged his word to be with all his people "where two or three or met together." Yet, some are always LATE at prayer-meeting or other services,—sit in the back seat when they do come, and, alas! some seldom get there at all. "THEY CAME * * AND FOUND * * THE BABE lying in a manger." The inns were all over crowded, so that Joseph and Mary had to put up with such accommodations as they could find. Often the people of the Orient provided quarters for their cattle under the same roof with themselves, separated from the house by a stone wall. Frequently the stone mangers are used in the summer time for cribs for the children. Possibly in one of these mangers Jesus lay.

III. THE SHEPHERD'S TESTIMONY.

The knowledge of salvation inspires its possessor with a desire to spread the news abroad. And what is strange the more we tell it the deeper our joy; the more we give the more we have. "THE SHEPHERD'S MADE KNOWN ABROAD THE SAYING WHICH WAS TOLD THEM CONCERNING THE CHILD." They told it wherever they went. But "ALL THEY THAT HEARD IT WONDERED AT THE THINGS WHICH WERE TOLD THEM BY THE SHEPHERDS." But wonder and amazement cannot save the soul. It is our privilege to have a rich experience in acquaintanceship with Jesus.

While others "wondered" MARY KEPT ALL THESE THINGS, AND PONDERED THEM IN HER HEART." It is a good thing to ponder God's dealings with us, and especially to ponder His word in our hearts. The shepherd's now return to their respective places of work to engage in their ordinary routine of life. But they bring back with them a rich feast of joy. While in the discharge of their daily tasks, they enjoyed this unexpected treat; the unsurpassed riches of the blessing does justify them in forsaking their usual vocation. Faithfulness in life's plain and honest duties is the surest road to heavenly blessings.

The Poor In India.

On Sunday, July 10, 1892, at the seventh world's student conference, at Northfield, Bishop James M. Thoburn of India spoke on the work in his field. He said in substance: "There are more distinct peoples in India than in Europe. The different nations are recognized as easily as those of Europe. In the district where I am located, the gospel is preached in thirteen different languages and each language has its literature. There are very many castes. From the Brahmins down to the Sudras of the old division men are considered respectable, and many occupy high official positions; but below that they are regarded as below all possible social respect. Poverty is worse there than here. The poorest wretch in New England would be considered comfortable there. The great majority of the laboring classes consider themselves well provided for by an income of $25 a year. In twenty-four hours I could get 1,000 laborers for a year at $ 2 per month, and there would never be the least danger of a strike. Most of them have but two meals a day, and some only one. The majority of the people of that grade don't get the food that hunger craves. More than 100,000,000 people will lie down tonight hungry and without more shelter than a tree.

When I went there thirty-three years ago there was no railway. Now we have 16,000 miles of railway, which have greatly facilitated mis sionary operations. Then our field included about 17,000,000 people, and a majority of our first converts among them were professional thieves. After a while, children of these thieves began to enter the schools and others followed. At the end of the next decade the census officer found the little community of 25,000 people had vanished, and he could not tell whither they had gone. Had he examined the column for native Christians, he would have found them there. They all became Christians.

This all went on till about four years ago, when we discovered at the close of 1888, that there had been something that looked a little like a movement during the year. From our statistics we found there had been something like 1,850 baptisms during that year, all done so quietly that it hadn't attracted attention. Nevertheless, some of us had misgivings, noting the converts were fr m the low class and thinking they would bar out the higher class. But we found the baptisms in both classes had increased together."

After telling some incidents of his work, Bishop Thoburn closed as follows: "It is my belief that among the 30,000,000 people below the line I have described at the present time in India there is a strange expectation. If all Christendom were to turn in and give the attention God demands I believe millions of people would be brought to Christ within the next few years. We say we cannot do it simply because in the days gone by we have dealt with smaller figures, but a million a year would take 284 years to convert India. If you tell me the time will never come when they will all be converted, who is going to reach them? There are young people here to-day who will live to rejoice annually over the news from the heathen world that 1,000,000 heathen have thrown away their idols and accepted Jesus Christ."—Young Men's Era.

Christian Cheer.

Christian service is not always preaching and monkish prayers. We were on shipboard a few years ago with Earl and Lady Aberdeen. After a flurry of fear over what might have been a sad accident, when the decks were crowded with passengers from the saloon and steerage, the Lord and Lady and one companion started, "My faith looks up to thee, thou Lamb of Calvary;" and the whole ship load joined in the song. That was a Christian service. Says Christ to his people at home and abroad, "Ye are my witnesses." If our witness of Him be true, summer tours will not be fretful junketings, barren of good works, but as birds and bees in travel carry seed and pollen from flower to flower and from tree to valley, so the Christian tourist will carry Christian cheer from place to place where he journeys.—Chicago Interior.

FIELD NOTES.

Bozeman.

Rev. S. B. Tabor:—Brother Squires was with me last Sunday. While here he preached four times, administered sacrament, and held the first quarterly conference. He looks well after all the interests of the church. There were good congregations at all the services, and the spirit of the Lord was present with us. Our work is widening every day. Will commence a meeting in two weeks. Brother Alton will assist me. Mrs. Tabor is on her way from Mo. May be you think I am not happy. [No, Brother, we don't think any such thing. We know you are, and you have great reason to be. The above should have appeared in last week's issue, but was mislaid. Shall try to prevent such a recurrence. We prize such notes, and hope to get them often.—Ed.]

Deer Lodge Notes.

Our church at Deer Lodge has just enjoyed a gracious revival. The results did not meet our wishes, still they were enough to stir our gratitude to God and greatly encourage us in the Master's work. We began the third Sunday in October, and for the most of three weeks had the good help of Bro. Alton of Butte City. He preaches the pure gospel and gives no quarter to worldliness in the church. His faithful work will be remembered in Deer Lodge. Bro. Squires helped me a week longer and the tide of blessing rose still higher. The brethren all know him and the value of his help in a meeting. He is very apt to have a revival if he stays a week at our place. That is a good quality in any preacher and especially in a presiding elder.

As part of the results of our meeting there were several bright conversions and seven additions to the church. Others will come in. The church was revived and new power put into all its machinery.

Our congregations are very good. Yesterday Bro. Squires was with us and administered the sacrament in the morning. At night we received two members into the church. Our Epworth League and Ladies' Parsonage Society are doing good work.

We held union Thanksgiving services this year at the Christian (Campbellite) church. There is true fraternity here between the preachers if not between the churches. We are indebted to the "Christian" brethren for the use of their baptismal tank for immersing a candidate for membership last week. They seemed glad to accommodate us, and wished we might have need of it frequently. That is no, likelyt however, unless in this case, the candidate comes from a Baptist family.

Deer Lodge is out of the race for capital now, but as an attractive place for residence we think it will still lead all towns in Montana.

Nov. 28, 1892.

From Parallel, Kansas.

Dear Brother Stanley:—I want to renew for the "Methodist," so find enclosed one dollar. I want it changed from May Day, Kansas, to Parallel, Washington County, Kansas.

We have just closed a four weeks' meeting at Mt. Hope with two conversions and one backslider reclaimed. This is the old church that used to stand in Waterville, and the cyclone blew it away. Then they moved it out to where it now stands, on Walnut Creek; and we are hoping it will be struck again, at least so demolished that one won't know it. We begin to-night at Townsend school house.

W. H. Kincaid,
Parallel, Kansas.

The mention of the old church at Waterville awakens many memories in the mind of this writer. The place where Waterville now stands was embraced in the first circuit to which the writer was ever appointed. It was before Waterville was laid out. "Irving Mission" was the name of the charge, and Rev. H. H. Hedgepeth, of sainted memory, was the name of the presiding elder under whom we labored as a "supply." The first revival that we ever held was in a log cabin covered with dirt and "clap-boards" ("shakes" some people would call them), in which many precious souls were happily converted, some of whom are now in heaven, while others are "happy on the way." It was a glorious time. During the year some "lewd fellows of the baser sort" laid in wait to mob the young, because of the church that he represented, but their hearts failed them, and the work went gloriously forward. The next year Rev. W. A. Hanna doubled the membership and started the subscription for the church. The year following, Rev. J. J. Warren and the writer commenced the work. We gathered our force, went to the stone quarry, got out the stone, laid the foundation and builded thereon, doing not a little of the work with our own hands, in which we were nobly assisted by E. P. Dyer, C. Hockensmith, Neal King, Jeff. Cox and others. The work ceased almost where we left it to begin our round of protracted meetings prior to going to conference. But afterwards, through the liberality of P. R. King, a layman of precious memory belonging to our church at Atchison, Kansas, the house was made ready and dedicated in time to be carried many feet from its foundation and set down again (so we were told) without even displacing the lamp from the stand on which it set. The very timbers in the old building are precious to us, and still more so, the names of the men who helped to purchase them, as well as of the good women, who cooked our meals and cared and prayed for us while we tried to put them in place. Ah! brother, deal gently with the old building. It has a history, as does every other structure of a similar kind throughout the entire length and breadth of our great church. Many prayers and tears and hard licks are builded into its walls. It has been useful in its time. In the last day it will be said, "this and that man were born there." If its days of usefulness are ended, pray that a spiritual cyclone may strike the hearts and pockets of the people living round about and give them such a shaking up that they will hardly know themselves, and give them no rest until "they rise up and build" a house more in keeping with the mansions they have built for themselves with the means that God has given them; and may the glory of this latter house exceed the glory of the former."

We trust the reader, and our brother Kincaid will pardon us for this digression. It is not meant for a criticism. When we read his letter our pen commenced moving and once it got to going we just couldn't stop it. May the Lord bless our dear Brother and all the good people on Waterville charge with a wonderful revival this year.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Washington Letter.

Washington, D. C., Nov. 29, 1892.

An Extra Session suits people here and they are asking everybody what they think about it. Senator Vest opposes. He "thinks seriously of the responsibilities which the Democratic party now have to face." He opposes a "cavalry charge" upon the tariff and says "men who have business interests at stake are conservative no matter to which party they belong." Holman does not think an extra sessien necessary. Mills, Crisp and a majority of Democratic leaders are non-committal. Of 188 Congressmen interrogated 72 favor an extra session, 78 oppose and 12 are on the fence. It is not probable that the Democratics will accept Republican views of their duty by calling an extra session—at least not earlier than next October.

The Tariff and a possible deficit are of course the great questions, and the former is a difficult one. Holman says: "I favor a tariff for revenue only and would put sugar on the free list. In tariff revision much more can be accomplished by doing that work in the ordinary manner and through the ordinary channels than by calling an extra session." Mills says: "I am in favor of putting all raw material on the free list and a revenue duty on the manufactured article. The tariff should be remodeled from top to bottom with no half-way business about it. It will take time to do this, for when you get at it you strike all kinds of snags. The man who has a constituency that raises wool wants you to leave your hands off of him, the steel rail man wants you to pass him and make up your revenue from the lumber district, and the lumber district Representative urges the House to look to the coal district, and so to the end of the list."

The Treasury. Ex-Govenor Black proposes that the Treasury Department frame a bill next summer for Congress to consider at the regular session. Others say "yes if Cleveland will give us a secretary as capable as Dan Manning, Carlisle for example." Another proposition suggests a commission composed of members of ull parties to frame a bill.

Deficit. If it is necessary to raise money next spring and to call an extra session why not impose a tariff on luxuries according to the good old Democratic doctrine and leave the re adjustment of the present tariff for a full and deliberate revision at a regular session. Tax the fancy high-priced drinks, table luxuries, ornaments, bric-a-brac, articles of fashionable smuggling of wearing apparel, jewelry and the like and if necessary tax large incomes.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE comes to the front again while Frenchmen are crowding American commerce off from the Isthmus of Panama. It is bad enough to have British guns pointing directly into every front door, but to let France close up our back door at Panama and destroy our treaty rights with Columbia is too much to bear. Let us insist upon fair play on the Isthmus and see to it that the Nicaraugua Canal is completed. Why should this wealthy, powerful and liberal nation be crowded and snubbed by the old world powers? CAPITAL

Women and Drink in England.

From Miss Willard's Address.

It is an astounding fact that 8,373 women have been arrested in the streets of London within the last year for being what the police call "drunk and disorderly." The worst of it is that this number does not at all reveal the actual enormity of the situation, for it is almost wholly the lower classes that these figures represent. There are regular sets of drinking women who club together and treat each other and do not allow themselves to fall into the hands of the police, while the secret drinking of the most aristocratic classes swells still further the pitiable army, wholly from the mother sex, who are giving themselves to the devil through the voluntary insanity of alcohol.

The precautions with which our country has this year guarded the people from the ravages of Asiatic cholera have been peremptory in the extreme, and although we must ever deeply regret that a panic-stricken population behaved with inhumanity to helpless and unprotected travelers, we applaud the foresight that has thus guarded our shores. Is it unreasonable, therefore, to hope that the same protecting care may some day be extended to a disease far more devastating than the dreaded contagion—transmitted as it is by the laws of heredity and the miasmatic conditions of impure homes?

Last year a saloon-keeper made the attempt to import bar-maids from London. Twenty-four hours after this announcement was made, telegrams and letters had gone to the white-ribboners, urging them to concentrate against this new outrage upon woman. Their petitions were immediately drawn up and issued by Mrs. Mary T. Burt and her sturdy clan—22,000 women of the Empire State concentrated their efforts upon Albany, and a law was passed prohibiting the hire of women in the dramshops of the commonwealth.

PROHIBITION.

There is no object that we white-ribboners so much desire to photograph upon the brain of every voter as the American saloon. It is a larger picture in this country than it can be in any other, because we are the largest of republics. The most portentous factor in American politics is the saloon. It has been recently stated that there are nine thousand saloons in New York City, and that on these saloons there are four thousand chattel mortgages, held almost wholly by twenty wholesale dealers, brewers and distillers. These saloons control the votes of forty thousand men and these forty thousand constitute the balance of power, so that we have twenty men who can swing the vote of New York City; but as the city goes so goes the state; and as the state, so goes the nation. We want the saloon photographed with this shadow in the picture. Whoever speaks of it as an isolated institution, speaks ignorantly. It is an institution, the character of which becomes more clearly defined each year, and one that, because of our form of government, exposes us more than any other people to political corruption. Because these things are true the temperance women of America have gone into politics, and have taken sides with the men who first, last, and all the time cast their ballots against candidates for office who are pledged to the saloon. We could not do less; if we could we would do more. We found our faith in prohibition upon no surface reasons, but upon principles that are settled as gravitation.

Danger Signals.

On the top of a hill in England there is now a notice-board with the inscription, "This hill is dangerous to cyclists." Before that notice was put up, a stranger had ridden down the hill. Before he had proceeded many yards his machine became unmanageable, and he was thrown with a sickening thud upon the pavement, and killed upon the spot. After that they put up the notice. If every place where a young man's life has been ruined were to be labeled, then every saloon in the United States would have to be labeled, "This place is dangerous to young men." Every racing course, every theater, variety show and dime museum, and every dancing saloon, would have to be labeled, "This place is dangerous to young men."—Zion's Herald.

Bishop Fitzgerald, in propounding the disciplinary questions to the candidates for admission at the Holston Conference, added one new question to the list. After the class had responded to the question, "Are you in debt so as to embarrass you?" the Bishop asked: "Are you in debt so as to embarrass anybody else?" There was a ripple of merriment at this unique and characteristic addendum to the interrogatory catalogue.—Tennessee Methodist.

The "Northwestern Christian Advocate," published at Chicago, is keeping vigilant eyes on the doings of the World's Fair managers. It says: "It is not a little singular that, from the advocates of an open fair on Sunday, we hear nothing about a free admission on that day? If it is for the educational advantage of the poor, why not give them this special training free of charge? If there is no thought of money in it for the stockholders, why this immovableness on the question of gate money? What about the interests of the poor man when the Fair is over? And what about the interests of our American thought and civilization upon the righteousness of which the condition of the poor man so mightily depends?"

Sifting Boys.

Speaking, in the Golden Rule, of young people who improve, and of young people who waste their opportunities, President Gates, of Iowa College says;

Not long ago I was looking over some of the great saw mills on the Mississippi river in company with the superintendent of the mill. As we came to one room he said: "I want you to notice the boys in this room, and I will tell you about them afterward." There were some half dozen boys at work on saws, with various machines, some broadening the points of the teeth, some sharpening them, some cutting the slots deeper. There was one lad standing leaning against a bench, apparently trying to do nothing and succeeding. After we had passed out of the room the superintendent said to me: "That room is my sieve. The fine boys go through that sieve to higher uses and higher pay. The coarse boys remain in the sieve, and are thrown out as refuse, so far as this mill is concerned." Then he explained what he meant. "I pick up a boy who wants to work in the mill, and give him the job of keeping the men in all parts of the mill and yard supplied with drinking water. That is the lowest position, and draws the least pay, for the reason, of course, that there is the least head work required. Then I say to that boy: 'When you have nothing else to do, go into this room and then I shall know where to find you when I want you.' But there is a much more important reason why I send him there. In a business like this, hands are constantly changing. A great deal of the work, as you will see by watching the machines and those that manipulate them, requires a high degree of attention, energy, and good judgment. In the close competition of modern business life, whether this great mill runs at a margin of profit or loss will sometimes depend upon the one man who runs the gang saw. Consequently, I must be looking out for the best men to put into these responsible positions which draw the largest pay. Now I put the water-boy into this room where there are several kinds of work being done. There are pieces of broken saws lying about and some of the tools that are used on them. I watch that boy. If he goes to handling those broken saws, looking them over, trying them, practicing on them with the tools there, busies himself watching the other boys at their machines, asks questions about how the work is done, and is constantly occupied in some way or another in his leisure moments, why that is the kind of boy that is very soon promoted to work on the machines, and is pushed ahead just as rapidly as opportunities offer. He soon goes to a better position and better pay, and I get a new water-boy. He has gone through the sieve. But there is another kind of boy. When he has time off duty, he occupies himself in that room doing nothing. He stares listlessly about, leans up against the benches, crosses one leg over the other, puts in a good deal of time whistling, stares about out the window, evidently wishing he were out there, watches the clock to see how soon he can quit work. If he talks with the boys who are at work, it is not to ask them questions, but to bother them with some nonsense or other. I often do all I can to help such a boy. I push the tools around under his nose. I ask him questions about them. I talk with him about his future prospects. I do all that I can to crowd him into some sort of decent physical or intellectual energy. If the boy has any wake up in him, well and good. If he has not, he is simply refuse matter. I don't want such a boy in this mill, even as water-boy."—Sel.

Memory Studies.

Methods to improve the memory are now all the rage. Various systems are extant and advertised reliable. A good memory is very desirable in many ways and we do well to increase its strength as much as possible.

Notwithstanding, it would be a great boon to humanity were some genius to invent a method to forget. Many things could be forgotten, and not leave us or the world any the worse for it. Among such we would suggest: evil thoughts, our neighbor's faults, envy, jealosy, injustice done us, unkind treatment from others, needless cares for the future, etc. A system whereby these and kindred affairs of mankind could be forgotten, effectively and lastingly, would prove quite as beneficial as any method to improve memory. Christ Within.

[Rev. Henry M. Grout.]

When certain came to Jesus asking, "Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?" he made answer: "If any man love me he will keep my words, and I and my Father will love him,and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." That is, he comes to abide. Converse with Christ, much speaking with him, the frequent outgoings of thought and heart to him as one who is near, and trusted, and desired—all that we mean by fellowship with him—are included in the experiences of those who have thus truly begun to live. In that heart of yours, once filled with self and sin, you have made room for him. It is because he is there that you are something other than you were. Take care, therefore, to renew each day those expressions of welcome which you uttered when he was first received. Take care to ask of him the daily supplies needed to make you steadfast and strong, as well as peaceful and glad. A remarkable story is told by the late Dr. Bushnell of an underwitted person, generally taken for an idiot, who, in addition to his natural disadvantages,was deep in the vices of profanity and drunkenness. In a time of religious awakening this forlorn being came to inquire the way of salvation. Straightway he became a subject of mirth among the light-minded; while Christian people looked upon him with more of pity than of hope. And yet from that hour, through succeeding years, he was manifestly a new creature. To his old vicious habits he never yielded an inch. He was an example of constancy and consistency to many. He wore out more than one bible by faithful use. He saved of his earnings for objects of Christian benevolence. When asked by his friends to explain what was to all so great a wonder, how it was that profanity and drunkenness never once got an advantage of him, his uniform reply was,"Why,I have seen Jesus." The incoming of Christ means power and peace, and the outgoing of satan with all his hosts. It means power so to live and walk, and so at last to die, as not to fail of a sight of him in his glory, and of a place at his right hand.

A Valuable Bible.

The most valuable book in the world is said to be a Hebrew Bible at the Vatican in Rome. In 1512, Pope Julius, then in great financial straits, refused to sell it to a syndicate of rich Venetian Jews for its weight in gold. The Bible weighs more than 325 pounds and is never carried by fewer than three men.

The Power of Christ.

Could not Christ have saved Lazarus from dying? Could not Christ save you or me from perplexity or from temptation or from doubt? Surely, those are questions which have their lower and their higher answers. He could, because the power of life and death was in him. But the power to use the power depended on other things. It depended on the necessity which lay back of all things in Jesus to do the absolutely best thing—not the second best, but the absolutely best of all. If it were best for Lazarus to die, then Christ could not have caused that he should not have died. That is a sublime incapacity; to stand with the gift of life in the all-powerful hands, to see the cry for life in the eager eyes to hear it in the dumb appeal of the terrified lips, and yet to say, "No, not life but death is best," and so to be unable to give life—that is a sublime, a divine incapacity! Could not Christ have answered your prayer? No, he could not; not because the thing you asked for was not in his treasury, but because behind the question of his giving or refusing it there lay the fundamental necessity of his nature and his love, that he should do for you only the absolutely best. The thing you asked for was not absolutely best, therefore he could not give it. Back of how many unanswered prayers lies that divine impossibility!—Phillips Brooks.

The Unclouded Vision.

Once when a boy, I stood on Mt. Pleasant,at Amherst, and saw a summer thunder storm enter the valley of the Connecticut from the north. Before it all was bright; centerwise it was black as midnight, and I could see the fiery streaks of lightning streaking down through it; but behind the cloud--for I could see the rear--it was bright again. In front of me was the mighty storm hurtling through the sky; and before it I saw the sunlight, and behind it I saw the sunlight; but to those who were under the centre of it there was no brightness before and behind it. They saw the thunder gust, and felt the pelting rain, and were enveloped in darkness, and heard the rush of winds; but I, that stood afar off,could see that God was watering the earth, and washing the leaves, and preparing the birds for a new outcome of jubilee, and giving to men refreshment and health. So I conceive that our human life here, with its sorrows and tears, as compared with that we are going into, is no more than the breath of a summer thunder storm, and if God sees that our experience in this world is to work out an exceeding great reward in the world to come,there is no mystery in it to him. —Henry Ward Beecher.

—o—

No man can ever break any of the other commandments while he is keeping the first one.

The Royalty of Manliness.

The true king of men must first be king over himself. No use to teach others until we have ourselves learned the lessons of life; no chance of ordering other lives till we have brought order into our own;no power of influencing others till we have learned how to use the influences which have come to us; no right to command till we can command ourselves. He who would be king over the hearts of men must have won mastery over his pas sions, appetite, senses and faculties, and forced them into their due and proportionate relations each to each, and each to the whole. The king, in the following of Jesus, must be his own king, and know and love the great King—God the Father, whose crown is righteousness and whose scepter is love. That is the first requisite of kingship—self-kingship.

And when he has won that within, and in the soul is good government and law and temperance, and among the faculties mutual honor and peace, in which all the powers of the man can grow in graciousness and leisure —that the kingship takes its outward form among men, and its gentle power begins. The first thing, then, a king of men does is, in every part of life, at home and abroad, to do justice,a grave and difficult task:justice to his children, justice to his fellow-workers in all business of every kind, justice to all whom he employs, not only according to the courts of law, but such justice as will not allow one grain of injury to be done, by commission or omission, to any man, woman or child, even though such injury makes our purse fuller, our dividends higher, or our place in the world better. The first duty of a king is to be absolutely just, in the sense in which his soul tells him that God desires him to begin such a sense that he would not be ashamed to stand before Jesus and all the heavly host and say, "I have not allowed any unjust thing to be said or done by others in my name, or by myself, to any person in the world for my own advantage." Were that the case all around, do you think there would be all the starving poor of London, or the quarrels between workmen and capitalists, or half the crime and drunkenness there is, or the misery of life deprived of its fair share of light and air, food and water? No. It is because men and women are not just to one another – just in the fashion of Christ—that there is no true kingship wrought by those who have the power, none of that true splendor which is contained, not in flinging charity now and then to the guilty and the wretched, but in doing justice all around, no matter how it affects our "getting on," as we call it, "in life," getting on, as it should be called, "in death."—Stopford Brooke

The Statue Question.

The way of the transgressor is hard. This truth finds fresh illustration in the trouble that the managers of the Montana exhibit for the World's Fair are having over the selection of a model for the statue. It was decided that in connection with the Montana exhibit, as its chief attraction and glory, there should be a life-size statue of Justice made of solid Montana silver, the model to be that of a Montana maiden of perfect form and spotless character. Diligent search, however, failed to find one of Montana's fair daughters—all honor to them for it—who was willing to pose as a model before a sculptor and expose her form divine to the critical and sensuous gaze of a motley multitude. Upon learning this fact, an ambitious young actress volunteered not only to sacrifice all the womanly modesty in the case but offered the commissioners the round sum of three thousand dollars for the privilege. Though not a Montanian, nor even a native American (if we have been rightly informed), yet a faultless figure and a fat pocket-book found favor and she was accepted for the situation. But this action is being severely criticised by others in authority, partly (and principally, perhaps) because the product of Montana, and partly because it is argued that a professional actress is not a fit character to represent the ideal figure of Justice. The commissioner who acted in the case makes his defense in the fact that no other subject could be found, and it was a case of necessity. Then, the "Limerick beauty" possessed a faultless physique, besides a pretty face, and cold art demanded this as the chief requisition. Character is a matter of minor consequence!

The dilemma into which our designers are brought is sufficient to condemn the entire scheme. The idea that a pure, chaste woman, such as presides in the ideal Montana home, would consent to pose in such a public way is absurd, while the thought of a professional play-house performer who would not be admitted to the best homes, or the best society of our land, posing on a pedestal as the perfection of Purity and the public representative and ideal of the womanhood of our state is preposterous. The fact that she is moulded into solid silver only advertises more loudly our folly.

It is an affront to the womanhood of the country to ask the sacrifice that the carrying out of this scheme contemplates, and also to the Christian sentiment of the land, which is decidedly adverse to the theater, to ask it to do obeisance to the goddess of the playhouse before a gazing world. In the name of justice, purity, propriety and common decency, we protest against the scheme. Better, far better, have no statue than do violence to the pure instincts of our fair daughter, much less an entire commonwealth, or turn our exhibit into an advertising scheme for a theater actress, however well favored in fortune or physical proportion, who has already been amply compensated for the amount offered for the display of her charms, in the notoriety she has gained through the public prints.

Patriotism Indeed!

The proprietor of a prominent periodical published in the interes, of the World's Fair at Chicago writes to the editor of this paper: "I am surprised that a man occupying so prominent a position as you do, should be so opposed to nineteenth century sentiment as to strongly oppose Sunday-opening of the Fair. It is not patriotic and will not glorify either God or man to do so, while opening the Fair will give thousands upon thousands an innocent pleasure."

We confess equal candor with our correspondent, but convictions quite contrary. Whenever "nineteenth century sentiment" or any other century sentiment is right opposite to the teachings of God's Word, the needs of man's physical and moral nature, and to several centuries of wholesome practice by our people, we shall feel called upon to oppose it to the extent of our ability. The sentiment that led to the permanent settlement of our country, that laid the foundations of our government, framed our laws, established our institutions, preserved and brought us safely through all the dangers of the past, gave us our prosperity and made the "World's Fair" a possibility, recognized the sacred character of our Sunday, insomuch that even a document dated on that day is not of legal force, and hence the man who tries to destroy the Sabbath, which the action sought virtually does, is the unpatriotic one. Better say that Sunday opening of the Fair will give the money of thousands upon thousands of Sabbath desecrators to the managers of the Fair who are NOT innocent, which is really what they are after, and will rob thousands upon thousands of laboring men and women, employes at the grounds and on the railroads, of the rest that they so much need, and would otherwise have, on the Lord's day.

Patriotism indeed! It is the patriotism of the pocket. It is advocated by the managers, who seek to make all they can out of it, and by the saloon, and the lawless element of the land. Will not the masses of working people understand that opening the Fair on Sunday, while it may bring temporary pleasure, will be a curse to them in the end? It will tend to secularize the Sabbath—make it a day of labor, and thus fall far more heavily upon the non-Christian laborer than at present. The Sabbath is the friend of the poor.

If we are any judge of the tone of "nineteenth century sentiment," as expressed in the petition to Congress representing forty millions of our people, praying Congress not to permit the opening of the Fair on Sunday, and then the action of Congress upon the subject—it is clearly against Sunday opening.

Notes and Comments.

A good Methodist lady acquaintance of ours, residing at Grantsdale received a letter appealing to her as a german, to use all her influence in opening the World's Fair on Sunday. She declares that they are mistaken in the person addressed, for, though a German by birth, she is a Christian and an American by adoption, and will do all in her power to affect Sunday closing at Chicago and every other place. Would that everyone hailing from the Fatherland, would cherish the same sentiments.

We have seen it reported that the Prince of Wales had a race-horse entered and so went in a gambling expedition instead of attending the funeral services of the poet Tennyson. It will be a disgrace, not only to England, but to humanity in general for such a character to occupy the position so long graced by noble Queen Victoria. Surely it will never be.

The will of Jay Gould retains the bulk of his fortune, amounting to $75 000,000 or $100,000,000, in the circle of his own family. His greatness, if he possessed such a quality, consisted principally in his greed for gain and the ability to gratify it. Acquired by gambling and other illegitimate enterprises, no wonder that so little is given to charity, and no wonder that not a tear is shed and no one mourns outside of his own family circle. How dark and cheerless the tomb, yea, even life in this world, to such a character. So is it with every man who is rich in this world and not rich toward God.

The principle practiced by the selfish individual—the man who is always receiving, whether it be wealth, honor, knowledge, or any of the good things of this life—and never dispensing, if carried out in nature would cause every fountain to cease flowing, every rose to cease blooming and shedding its fragrance on the desert air. It would stay the wheels of commerce, hush every song and shout of joy and gladness, turn every sunbeam into an icicle, yea, it would veil the sun itself and fill the universe with the blackness of darkness forever. God and Christ and Christianity are right the opposite of this. God is love, and loving is giving. He so loved that he gave His only begotten Son. Christ so loved that He gave Himself, and the true Christian, who has the love of God shed abroad in his heart, is willing to count all things but loss that he may win Christ, to spend and be spent in doing His will.

Christ came into the world not to be ministered unto, but to minister. He said, if any man be great among you let him be your servant. True greatness is measured by its ability and willingness to minister. True mastery is that which comes through ministry. Christ gave himself for our sins, the just for the unjust, and is exalted at the right hand of the throne of God. It is only as we minister and bear witness for our Lord that we have hope of becoming kings and priests unto God.

Dear reader, are you a Christian? If not, why not? You believe in God, in Christ, in Christianity, and expect to be truly religious some day. Why not to day? You act with common sense and promptness in affairs that pertain to your temporal wel-fire. Why not practice the same discretion and promptness in looking after the interests of your immortal soul. If you cannot give an excuse that you would be willing to present to the judge in the last great day, you should be alarmed. Delays are dangerous. "Mercy knows the appointed bound, and turns to vengeance there." Now is the accepted time,the day of salvation, the gracious time. Mercy is inviting, and Christ is waiting to welcome you home.

"While God invites how blest the day,
How sweet the gospel's charming sound;
Come sinner haste, oh, haste away,
While yet a pardoning God is found.

This glad new year, when Christian people throughout the world are engaged in special prayer, when new resolutions are being formed, and new enterprises are being undertaken will you not resolve to abandon a life of aimlessness and selfishness, give up all, deny yourself, take up your cross and follow Christ? May God help you to make the full surrender, to give up all for His sake now, and may He fill your soul with that peace that passeth all understanding, and help you to fight the good fight of faith and win the crown of life at last.

Brother, do you belong to the church, or does the church, in your way of thinking and acting belong to you? Are you submitting to its discipline, attending upon its ordinances and supporting its constitutions, or are you rather trying to make it submit to your whims causing it to suffer, while you stay away from its services and neglect its ordinances, and force its institutions to support you in good social standing, while you make a Christian profession, which has the form but is destitue of the power of godliness? These are vital questions and should be answered honestly and conscientiously by every professor of the Christian religion. The Church is God's army, and discipline, submission to rightful authority, every man doing his duty, is necessary to a complete victory. It is Christ's body, and as the failure of one member weakens the body, so the refusal of one member of this great spiritual organism cripples and hinders it from doing its best service.

A revival of pure and undefiled religion is the crying need of the day and the hour. It will do more towards settling old scores;stirring up stewards, supporting preachers, building churches,parsonages,schools and colleges, purifying politics and providing for the proper entertainment of our guests at the great World's Fair, than all else combined. Such a revival at this time, as that which swept the country at the beginning of this century would impress the nations of the earth, with a sense of the divine reality and efficacy of the Christian religion than anything else that could happen. Our God is the same to-day as in 1804. Who knows but that He will make this the day of his power? Let us make it a subject of special prayer during our January meetings.

The chairman of the World's Fair commission has expressed himself as of the opinion that Congress will not rescind its action, and that the Fair will not be open on Sunday. This is encouraging. While we believe it is true, yet let not the order-loving part of our people be tempted to relax their efforts. Mass meetings are being held all over the country, and petitions are pouring in upon senators and representatives, protesting against a reconsideration. Let the good work go on. Our enemies are making their great fight now. Let us "stand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand."

The dispatches bring intelligence that James G. Blaine is on the verge of the grave, that his record is made and his career is almost ended. This will be sad news to many thousands of his admirers all over the land. Disappointment, bereavement, family troubles and disease are fast telling upon one of America's most conspicuous sons. May the great statesman be prepared for the final change.

At present there appears little prospect of any special benefit accruing to bi-metalism as a result of the silver congress at Brussels. England appears to have obstructed the movement, in the hope that she will get to exchange Indian silver for American gold. There is a growing sentiment in our country in favor of ceasing the purchase of foreign silver, which may have some effect in bringing the other nations to time on the money question. We confess that the question is too deep for us, but so far as we can see, the moneyed men are for gold while the masses are demanding that silver be re-monetized.

All the evangelical churches of the land, including the most devout and spiritual of the Catholics and Episcopalians, have spoken in opposition to the modern dance. The common testimony of Christian people, who know whereof they affirm, is to the effect that it is an enemy to vital religion, is base and sensual and degrading in its tendency. It encourages and leads to the worst of crimes. Cannot our young people who say they see no harm in it, accept the testimony of the great mass of the best people of the land who know something of the evil? By waiting a while, with a little observation, they will find that this testimony is true, and will have reason to rejoice that they were not drawn into the seething vortex. This is the devil's chief agency for seducing our young people into sin at this season of the year. Let them avoid the dance as they would the sting of a deadly serpent. Like the poisonous reptile, it has power to fascinate and charm the unwary, but there is death in it.

Brother T. D. Woodson, of Richmond, Mo., writes: "Some time ago I ordered my paper discontinued. As it still comes I think I had best pay for it. So enclosed find one dollar for another year's subscription. I wish you much success in the change to a weekly, but fear it may not pay you."

There will be no trouble whatever about the expense if all our friends who had thought of discontinuing will do like Brother Woodson, just charge their minds and pay up in advance. Our brother must pardon us. We did not aim to force the paper upon him—had just ordered it stopped—but are very thankful for his renewal and for his good wishes.

We take pleasure in correcting, and re-writing if necessary, the reports sent in by our friends whose opportunities have not been such as to enable them to write for the press. We hope that not one will ever hesitate to write us on this account. But we must insist that our friends who understand the art of correct writing and punctuation take the pains to perfect their copy before sending it to us. Our time and eyesight are just as precious as theirs, and they can do the work as well or better if they try. The printers are instructed to "follow copy." So please write every word in full, just as you would like to see it in print. We mail the matter for each issue on Monday night or Tuesday morning. Correspondence for the paper should reach us by Saturday, or at least by Monday morning of each week, to insure its early appearance.

At this writing winter has closed in upon us in earnest. The snow is about six or eight inches deep at Corvallis, and the weather cold but clear and calm.

An Every-Day Hero.

Rueben was a boy who dreamed of the heroic, but unheroically allowed his mother to weary herself in matters where he might have given a helping hand.

One day he took up a pamphlet that was lying on the schoolmaster's table. In it he saw a story called "The hero."

"Hello!" he cried. "What is this: A few years ago the traveller might have seen a charming little village—now, alas! no longer in existance. A fire broke out one day, and in a few hours the quaint little frame houses were entirely destroyed. The poor peasants ran around, wringing their hands and weeping over their lost homes and burned cattle.

One poor man was in greater trouble than his neighbors even. True, his home and the cows were gone,but so also was his only son, a bright boy of six or seven years old. He wept, and refused to hear any words of comfort. He spent the night wandering sorrowfully among the ruins, while his acquaintances had taken refuge in the neighboring villages.

Just as daylight came, however,he heard a well-known sound,and looking up he saw his favorite cow leading the herd, and coming directly after them was his bright-eyed little son.

"O, my son! my son!" he cried, "are you really alive?"

"Why, yes, father? When I saw the fire I ran to get our cows away to the pasture lands."

"You are a hero, my boy!" the father exclaimed. But the boy said:

"Oh no! A hero is one who does some wonderful deed. I led the cows away because they were in danger. and it was the right thing to do."

"Ah!" cried the father, "he who does the right thing at the right time is a hero."

Reuben read the story two or three times, and then he gave a long, low whistle which meant that he was seriously considering something.

"I wonder now if that is true," he thought. 'A hero is one who does the right thing at the right time.' There are plenty of chances for me to be that kind of a hero!"—Selected.

Properly Converted.

This is a Salvation Army expression, but it has a meaning very suggestive. "Cleanse me thoroughly" was David's prayer. "Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me." Many rise for prayer, and join the church, or profess conversion who may take a veneer of religion; but whose old natures still remain. No radical change has taken place. The result is the old nature soon crops out again. Old bents and dispositions show themselves and the cause of Christ is discredited by these unconverted professors.

Conversion means a new man, not a new coat. The converted man will not run with the old crowd, or indulge in the old pleasures, or give way for a moment to the old habits, because he has lost all relish for them. Old things have passed away.

King David's wretched lapse into sin called forth that piercing cry, "O God, renew a right spirit within me; restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation, and uphold me with Thy free Spirit!" That fifty-first Psalm—wrung out of a broken heart—has been of infinite value to God's people; if its beaconlight warns us against the terrible danger of sin, it also illumines the pathway of penitence and recovery. My reader hast thou wandered into perilous paths, and has the Divine Love stretched out its arms and rescued thee, and set thy feet again upon the rock? Then walk carefully and watch and pray. Sympathize with those who, through the weakness of their faith or the power of the tempter's assaults, have fallen from their first estate; and, re-converted thyself, do thy utmost to help and to stablish thy brethren.

"Man-like is it to fall into sin;
Fiend-like is to dwell therein;
Saint-like is it for sin to grieve;
Christ like is it all to leave."

REBUILDING THE TEMPLE.

Ezra III. 1–13.

BY REV. J. Q. A. CURRY.

CONNECTING LINKS:—The second chapter of Ezra gives a geneological review of the returning exiles. Considerable time was, no doubt, consumed in straightening up the family records and in locating them properly. Special care was taken that the priesthood should not be "polluted" by the admission of such persons as were ceremonially unfit for the sacred office. See chapter 2: 61–63. The numbering of the people was then completed and they were located properly after which the incident of our lesson occur.

I. BUILDING THE ALTAR.

Order is the first law of nature and grace. Time would be required to reduce that very jubilant mass of 50,000 persons to an organized body that could be commanded and controlled. As soon as this was accomplished, however, the primary object of their return was given immediate attention. "THE PEOPLE GATHERED TOGETHER AS ONE MAN TO JERUSALEM." Unanimity of purpose will surely be followed by concerted action. The disciples awaiting "the promise of the Father" "were with one accord in one place." Pentecost followed. With oneness of heart these people are met together in Jerusalem. SOMETHING WILL BE DONE. Very little good can be done when a congregation is broken up into factions. We must meet "AS ONE MAN." The first work done was the building of the altar. They could worship without a temple but they must have an altar. The first thing every family should do is to set up an altar unto the Lord. Worship sweetens labor. We must remember too, that these people were surrounded by those who were opposed to them, and who sought to hinder them in their work. Some practical sage might have suggested that it would have been more consistent with their surroundings to have builded some fortifications to protect them against their enemies. But the altar of the Lord is the strongest fortification that can be built. Build that FIRST; then look after minor matters. Morning and evening the smoke of the burnt offering ascended as in the days of old, to cheer their hearts, and remind them of their duty, as well as of God's kindly dealings toward them. The altar having been builded they are now prepared to observe all the feasts enjoined in the law of Moses. The first is "THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES." This was the Jewish thanksgiving day. It immediately followed harvest. It is significant that though they had not yet enjoyed a harvest in the homeland since their return, yet they observed the feast. They had abundant other reasons for thankfulness. Moreover, this feast also was intended to commemorate the fact of their being pilgrims and strangers. This feature was strikingly real at this time. For a description see Neh. 8: 15–17. This feast was followed by the reestablishment of the entire round of Levitical sacrifices. And perhaps they were more faithfully observed than ever before. In the land of captivity they seem to have been completely cured of idolatry, and their thirst for truly spiritual worship was greatly intensified. "AS THE DUTY OF EVERY DAY REQUIRED." REGULAR service is God's requirment of us. Serving the Lord by jerks and jumps is the failing of too many. "EVERYDAY" faithfulness is necessary to our happiness and safety. The eyes of the world are upon the professor of religion. Keep your lamp trimmed and burning.

II. LAYING THE FOUNDATION OF THE TEMPLE.

The services of the sanctuary having been established it is now time to begin the work of building the temple. Mechanics and material are now secured for the work. Skill is an important factor in carrying on the work of the Lord. Carpenters and masons are as essential as cedars and granite. The Sabbath School teacher who expects to succeed without some preparation will soon discover his mistake; and the sooner the better. Nearly two years were spent gathering material and getting ready for building. Time faithfully spent in the preparation for a good work is time well spent. But at last the time comes when the actual work of building is come. The event had been awaited with the most intense interest. Nor had they been idle in their preparation to properly celebrate it. The priests with their trumpets, and "the sons of Asaph with cymbals and song" had made provision for the musical part of the service. With the carpenters and masons must be added the singers and musicians. We can all find some place to work for God. The foundation is laid. The air vibrates with the sweet notes of juyful song and cheering music. It is a day of rejoicing. But there were tears of sorrow mingled with the shouts of praise. The new temple is much smaller than the old one. Some of the old men remember the splendor and glory of Solomon's temple. Although they are happy in being permitted to return from captivity; yet to them the loss is apparent. Alas! when we retrace the steps of our wanderings and see what and where we MIGHT HAVE BEEN our hearts may well grieve over the loss. It is far better not to turn aside from the glorious path of Christian life. But to those who for the FIRST time have tasted of the good word of God the joy is inexpressible and full of glory.

"Where Are They All Going?"

BY R. M. VAUGHAN.

Over the long, level miles our train sped on. Past fields and farm houses and factory villages we flew until at length we drew near a large city The speed slackened and at last the ocomotive groaning like "a monster n pain" stopped at the station. On the platform the impatient people ostled and pushed each other as they hurried on their way. Behind me sat a typical young American who belabored his weary mother with ceaseless questions. As his ready eye watched the mass of elbowing humanity he asked, "Where are all those people going?" Listlessly she replied: 'Oh, somewhere." I looked again and that crowd had a new meaning to me. All those hurrying people are going somewhere.

That young man who "walks as though his body has a soul in it" goes to win a fortune in the city's busy marts. Beside him is one whom you open door of vice will receive a new victim for her bloody altars. The father cheered by the thought of the "dear home faces." the mother on a visit to her daughter's home, the young lady who eagerly looks for her awaiting friend, the laborer seeking employment, the merchant with new orders, the proud and the poor, the glad and the weary, the befriended and the forlorn, the strong and the weak, the generous and the selfish, all are going—somewhere.

And yet there are but two ways in which they go—the broad and the narrow. Along the wide way many hasten, some lured by siren songs of sin, others driven by the deep cutting lashes of despair. Now the green grasses are cool and pleasant, but only "for a season" and all too soon the hot stony ground burns and bruises the bleeding feet. Some laugh and sing, some curse and moan, some deadened with opiates appear indifferent some with hot flushed brows, others with pale, ashen faces, but all alike are rushing on. At last they grow dim in the distance and are lost to sight as they pass over the Shadowy hills into the Land of Death, whence no echo of the cries ever comes back to the listening ears of the living.

Fewer feet walk the other way, but it is the way of life. In each pil grim heart Faith has an altar and from each expectant eye Hope looks for the Celestial City and on each lip Love trembles into a hymn of praise. Out of the Sloughs of Despond, past chained lions of temptation, over Delectable Mountains, through the Valley of the Shadow, on, on, Vanity Fair, Giant Despair, Beulah Land, the Golden Gates and at last the Paradise of God! Yes, they of the broad and the narrow way, all going—somewhere.

Bnt the end is not yet. The day long foretold, long awaited has come, the trumpet of God sounds and the dead awake. From Egyptian vaults and Roman catacombs, from Westminster crypts and country church yards, from the sepulchers of the sea and the unmarked graves of soldier dead, they come. And now "all nations" are gathered before the judgement throne of Him who once came, not to judge, but to save. With the perfect knowledge of secrets men thought unknown and deeds they deemed forgotten, the Judge awarding:

> "Each the bloom of blight,
> Parts the goats upon the left hand
> And the sheep upon the right."

The great separation is finiseed. They depart, going—somewhere. "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment but the righteous into life eternal.—Exchange.

Hard Work Necessary.

Do not get the fatal idea that you ore a genius, and that, therefore, there is no need of close application. It is here where multitudes fail. I had rather be an ox than an eagle; plain, and plodding and useful, rather than high flying and good for nothing but to pick out the eyes of carcases. Extraordinary capacity without work is extraordinary failure. There is no hopes for that person who begins life resolved to live by his wits, for the probability is that he has not any. It was not safe for Adam, even in his unfallen state, to have nothing to do, and, therefore, God commanded him to be a farmer and horticulturist. He was to dress the garden and keep it, and had he and his wife obeyed the divine injunction and been at work, they would not have been sauntering under the trees and hankering after that fruit which destroyed them and their prasperity; proof positive for all ages to come that those who do not attend to their business are sure to get into mischief.

I do not know that the prodigal in Scripture would ever have been reclaimed had he not given up his idle habits, and gone to feeding swine for a living. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard consider her ways and be wise: which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer and gathereth her food in the harvest." The devil does not so often attack the man who is busy with the pen, and the book, and the trowl, and the saw, and the hammer. He is afraid of these weapons. But woe to the man whom this roaring lion meets with his hands in his pockets.

Do not demand that your toil always be elegant, and cleanly and refined. There is a certain amount of drudgery through which we must all pass, whatever be our occupation. You know how men are sentenced a certain number of years to prison, and after they have suffered and worked out the time, then they are allowed to go free. And so it is with all of us. God passed on us the sentence: "By the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread." We must endure our time of drudgery, and then after awhile, we will be allowed to go into comparative liberty.—DR. TALMAGE IN CHRISTIAN HERALD.

HOW THE BATTLE IS GOING.

Helena Station.

R. H. Shaeffer:—I would be glad to see you over here. You might make it to your interest to come on a soliciting and collecting tour. [Thank you very kindly, Bro. Shaeffer. We are coming. and that very soon.—Editor]. We are moving smoothly in our church affairs. My congregations are improving. I have a devoted little band [We know that. God bless them.—Editor], and were all the membership as true and faithful as the few it would be a question of very short time only, when our house would be crowded. So many of our members have no idea of loyalty to Southern Methodism, which lack, to me, seems almost an unpardonable sin, especially in this country where a pure form of Christianity is so much needed. The sensational sot (pardon the use of the word), which captures so many, is very taking with a class. I am giving my people the pure and simple gospel in as attractive way as I can [that is the right kind.—Editor], and I hope to win a hearing after awhile. "God is my refuge and strength, in Him will I trust."

Coquille City, Oregon.

J. M. Parker:—I am well pleased with my charge. I hope to have a successful year here. The small-pox scare is over, and we have preached at all the appointments. Success to the "Montana Methodist."

East Helena.

L. Bramble:—I have had two reasons for not writing before. First, have had nothing of importance, and second, have been too busy. I am pleased to know that the "Montana Methodist is going to be a weekly visitor, and I will try and do more for it in time to come.

We are now trying to build a parsonage. Have made a beginning, and had hoped to have it completed by the first of February, but the closing down of winter upon us makes it somewhat doubtful as to when it will be finished. At my own suggestion there was no assessment made on this charge for me this year. I said, the people are poor and most of them encumbered with debt of their own, so that they cannot support me and help to build a parsonage; and the Lord will take care of me, and I have no fears but He will.

Since I commenced writing this letter my wife received a dispatch from Dayton, Ky., that her sister was lying at the point of death, and not expected to live; and she is now on her way there. Our afflictions are many, but I trust they are working for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Our Sunday-school is doing well, and we have now two libraries. Our congregations are holding up well; in fact they are increasing.

Our protracted meetings accomplished nothing in the way of visible results. Bro. Squires did some excellent preaching and singing. Bro. Warren preached us one very fine sermon. Brother Shaeffer was with us a few days, and his preaching was truly in demonstration of the Spirit and Power. But it was an unfavorable time—just on the eve of election.

Please remember us in your prayers.

Belgrade, Montana.

Editor "Montana Methodist:" The Belgrade charge, formerly the Bozeman Ct., is, I believe, still advancing. Last week we succeeded in paying off all the debt against our parsonage property here, leaving us one of the best parsonages in the conference. The parsonage has six rooms and a commodious cellar. We have a plot of ground 200 feet front and 150 feet deep, on one corner of a block. We have also a good stable for four head of stock, wagon shed, hay shed, chicken house, &c., &c. Half the property is fenced, and a small garden fenced off with wire netting. Last spring we set out a large lot of shade trees, including several evergreens. All are living and doing well. The property is worth $1,000.

We had three accessions the first quarter. Our congregations at every point here have been good. I begin a series of protracted services this week. I feel and see need of a general revival on this charge. But few of our old members are spiritual and the young people are fast being swallowed up by worldliness. The dance, the card table and the saloon are all enemies to the cause of Christ. Oh, for a Holy Ghost revival that will save the people from their sins. I have looked in on the brethren at Bozeman, now engaged in a revival meeting. Bros. Alton and Tabor are working nobly. May God give us a gracious revival in Bozeman.

Bro. Squires is active and is a man of one work. His place is a hard one and he has my sympathies. God give him health and strength to meet the demands made upon him.

Your brother,
B. C. H. Warren.

Bozeman.

Rev. S. B. Tabor's special meetings are now well into the second week. There is an increase of interest, and good results will follow. These meetings are being held in the M. E. Church, South —New Issue.

Field Notes.

By J. E. Squires, P. E.

Dear "Methodist:"—Your coming brings news from the different parts of the field, and thus helps the workers. I gladly add my mite to the contributions. The election passed off quietly and I am ready to believe that the "God of Nations" over ruled to his own glory, and for the good of all the earth—I have rarely voted for a successful candidate.

The "second round" of quarterly conferences began at Townsend with Bro. Lee. He had planned for a revival meeting embracing the occasion and had a very fine beginning for it by Sunday night, at which time we had two forward for prayer, who with other two joined the church that night. Bro's Shaeffer and Clark helped in the meeting after my departure, and the final result I have not heard.

A two weeks' meeting at Butte by the pastor resulted in two conversions and three good accessions to our church, at that place—I much enjoyed a prayer meeting service with those elect people the week following the meeting.

The Q. Conference for Stevensonville charge had been voted to meet at Victor, where I found the P. C. in a protracted meeting. In spite of snow and rain there was fair attendance, and prospect of good being done. The Sabbath was spent at Stevensonville, where the communion was administered to a large number of souls. The whole occassion was blessed in the presence and help of "Father Waggener," who makes his home with our Bro., W. O., the P. C. For many years a most successful pastor in the Virginia Conference, where he still holds a superannuated relation. He comes a blessing and inspiration to all who meet him. His power in prayer is wonderful and has greatly helped me.

Willow Creek and Whitehall circuit was the next place to be visited; and Summit Valley, the point at which the meeting was to be held. The first drive, of any mention, was taken from the new parsonage at Willow Creek to that place. Good wraps and a well heated rock for our feet kept us from freezing, for the four hours' ride. The occasion in that rural district was greater than an annual conference, in a city.

I have not had a warmer reception anywhere than at the homes of Bro's Runnels, Black, Smith, Woodside and Westmoreland. May God's blessing be upon their large and interesting families of little children.

I mention here the very excellent meeting at Willow Creek, held for about three weeks, in which I had the pleasure of working for four days. Bro's Slater and Tabor doing faithful work at periods in the meeting.

The meeting at Bozeman now in progress, with Bro. Alton assisting the P. C., is very promising. I go to them the last of the week; and we hope and pray for great things in that ripe and difficult field.

We are a revival church and our call to this field means to "spread scriptual holiness over these lands"—not any other kind. The Lord help us.

Homely Hints.

By Homety Homo.

Christmas bells have been ringing. Happpy children have been shouting and singing. Mirth and festivity have been in nearly all our homes. Did we forget, mid earthly joy, Him who in Bethlehem was born? Did we help and bless those unto whom He came and for whom He died?

"One church is just as good as another. I don't believe in being selfish and sectarian, etc." Did you ever see any one who loudly proclaimed such as the above that was much account in any church?

Is it either in accord with good taste or with the spirit of true humanity for God's servants to be always putting the "Rev.", or the "D. D.", or both to their names? Is it done to the glory of God, or to win attention from men?

The church's progress is hindered all over the West by the lack of stewards, who will faithfully do their work. Men who manage their own affairs energetically make the best stewards; provided they love God's church as much as they love their business, and are willing to give God's cause a part of their time.

——

Sister Much-Afraid-of-the-World has a chronic nervous spasm on hand nearly all the time for fear something the church does will not please Mr. Time-server, or Mr. Money-bags Don't be alarmed, my dear sister. Think more about doing your part of the church work, lean on God's promises, and believe Him when He says, "The gates of hell shall not prevail against His Church."

——

Good resolutions for the New Year! All right! Good actions are better. Live a new life, and put a "new song" into others' mouths.

——

Do you want your children to love the Southern Methodist Church? Then set the example by loving it a little more yourself, and stop finding fault with its usages, its methods, its ministers. If you really love it, and do your duty, your child will love it. No mistake about that. God is pledged to it, and He always keeps His pledges.

——

Thank God for the noble men and women who do love God and their church, and are loyal and true all the time. They can be relied on to lead even "in folorn hope," and stand in the "last ditch," unterrified, "Till Jesus comes." They are willing to "spend and be spent" in the church's service, and would die rather than betray its trusts, or go over to the "tents of the enemy." The nobility of earth! The aristocracy of Heaven! With uncovered head we salute you in the Lord's name. Lord bless you here, crown you up yonder, and increase you more and more.

——

I heard an "Old Timer" say some time ago that a "runt cayuse" would out-kick and out-"buck" a well grown animal. Just so, I thought, a RUNT Christian character, dwarfed, and stinted by worldliness and selfishness, and spiritual laziness, is apt to be a confirmed kicker and grumbler.

——

Sadder than the closing eyes of a dying child, is the sight of a young man turning away from home, mother and Jesus, and trying boldly to say: "I don't believe in God." The little child turns from earth to heaven, the young man turns from all that is good and self-blinded, stumbles towards hell.

——o——

Brother, you are "rustling" to pay your blacksmith, your store bills, etc. That is right. Pay your debts, but pay a fair share of all your accounts. "How much owest thou to my Lord?" How stands the Lord's account? Settle that also. You want a revival at your church. Why does it not come? May not its delay be caused by your failure to "bring in the tithes?" Read Malachi iii. 10.

——

Preaching for popularity, pandering to policy, fiddling with politics, produces a powerless ministry. Jesus didn't, Paul didn't. Let us all say together, "God helping, WE WON'T."

——o——

To the King's Daughters of the Methodist Church, South.

DEAR SISTERS:—Being one of your number and knowing our aim is to be an arm of service for the Lord ever ready to lend a helping hand, I feel assured you will listen to a call made upon you in His Name. The Parsonage and Home Mission Society—the regularly authorized Woman's Home Mission organziation of our own church—has undertaken to establish a school in the mountains between Kentucky and Virginia that we hope to make a base from which our Christian workers may reach out in all directions bearing the loving message of our Heavenly Father to many who have not yet regarded it. The inaccessibility of their homes has kept from the many in those regions advantages enjoyed by more favored localities, while their poverty has made it impossible for them to go from home to seek them. Thus ignorance fosters vice. Those who are able, appreciating its value, are willing to help secure the school. No better opening for Christian labor can be found than this school in the mountains will afford. We therefore desire to make every effort to place it there at as early a date as possible, and need your help to do so. Will you not take this as special work until it is accomplished? If you have a circle in your church, call a meeting and adopt this as your work. If you have no Circle accept individually this call for service, and give your aid for Christ's sake. Reports of work done by our King's Daughters will be given in "Our Homes," the organ of Woman's Home Mission work in our church and in this paper "The King's business requireth haste." In His name I ask prompt response.

Your Sister,
LUCINDA B. HELM, Gen'l Sec'y,
1500 Third Avenue,
Louisville, Ky.

Child-Likeness.

Child-likeness is highest manhood and womanhood. We have the authority of the Lord Jesus for this assertion, and the best experience of the race tends to its confirmation; yet there is a natural reluctance to accept this as a prevailing truth. We tell a boy to be manly, and a girl to be womanly; but we do not tell a man to be boy-like, and a woman to be girl-like. Yet it is pitiful to see premature manhood in a boy, or premature womanhood in a girl; while it adds a charm to the character of a true man to find him retaining his boy nature unimpaired to the last, and a true woman is all the lovelier for never losing her true girlhood. Childishness is to be avoided in a child, and to be left behind as one matures in life; but child-likeness is alike admirable in a child and in an adult. The Apostle Paul says: "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I felt as a child, I thought as a child; now that I am become a man, I have put away childish things." It is "childish" nature, not "child-like" nature, that is here spoken against. But our Lord said to the mature and the wise: "Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven;" and he declared that he who retains his child nature while receiving the highest spiritual truth, "is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven." Childishness we should shun; child-likeness we should strive after, or rather we should not strive away from.—Sunday School Times.

Christian Service.

Some words are plethoric with meaning. Sounded they are ocean deep. Lived out they would regenerate the world. Such words are Christian service. What is such service? Going to church on Sunday and on prayer-meeting nights? No. That is Christian feasting. Service for the minister, perhaps, but feasting for the people. Some Christians speak as though they were conferring a great favor on the Lord and the minister by attending the feasts of the church. They call it Christian service! Service is laboring for God. It is imparting, not receiving; expending, not obtaining. It is visiting the sick, praying with the impenitent, putting wood on fireless hearths, gathering street arabs into the Sunday School, seeking the lost Seeking, we say. Not waiting for them to come to us, but seeking them; seeking in the back alleys and slums, as well as on broad avenues and in mansions. Every day Christians pass by doors where there are hunger and disease and death, and never enter them. Every day the church bells ring over homes where there is every form of human need, and nothing is done to relieve it. Many of us are working by proxy. We help pay the pastor and city missionary; that is, we give in a year about what we spend for useless luxuries. And yet we are Christians. We wear the name of Him who was among men as one that serveth. It is an awful parody, this sitting in cushioned seats in silks and satins as members of the body of Him who had but one garment, and who "went about doing good." And let us emphasize the words "went about" as much as the words "doing good." There is a good deal of religious feasting and religious talking in these days, but the average church member needs a baptism of Christian doing. Nothing but Christian service of the kind which has self-denial for its corner stone and action for its superstructure will save the world.—Selected.

Home Piety.

It is in the home that character is not only most severely tested, but also comes to its best fruitage. The sacred relationships of the family, in their varied obligations, demand services that, for their fulfillment, call into exercise the noblest expression of self-sacrifice; a discipline of love, that when controlled and guided by spiritual life and purpose, develops the choicest fruits and influence of Christian character. Home piety reveals these qualities in the mightiest force through which the spirit of God works in making the family the saving unit of society. Is not this our great need? Homes redeemed and filled with spiritual light and blessing. The world will not be saved until the family life is purified in its springs of action. The churches cannot do the work for which they are set unless the Christian home lends its aid. The ideal, the meaning of the home must be lifted up. It is not alone a place for the shelter and physical care of loved ones. Above all other duties in the Christian family is that of spiritual training in all the ways of character building. By example, by precept, by education, piety, as expressing the need and life of God in the soul, should be the very atmosphere of the home.—Illustrated Christian Weekly.

Rest in God.

Human nature is restless. This restlessness is partially caused by sin, but it is also due to the greatness of human nature. But what is worst in us and what is best in us are fruitful of unrest.

For our sin there is no refuge save the indefinite mercy. For the immortal hunger of our hearts there is no satisfaction save the divine fullness. Our longings and aspirations become harmonious and steady only when divinely inspired. He is at rest who can say: "My soul waiteth upon God. My expectation is from Him." He can also say: "He is my rock and my defense I shall not be moved."

Circumstances are fluctuating, our nature is tumultuous and discordant, our fellow-men may deceive or disappoint us, those who are ever true may be removed from us; but God is changeless, He is infinitely loving. He is faithful, He is eternal. Confidence in the love, the wisdom and the fidelity of God will give us rest. Life's restless sea, with all its roaring billows of uncertainty, is held in the hollow of God's hand. The stormy waves are transitory, but the ocean of life is lasting, and God holds it forever. There is also peace in its depths. The waves are only on the surface.—Northern Christian Advocate.

The Dying Year,

Old year, you are faint. I can hear you sighing
Out in the cold where the bare trees bend.
The close has come; I can see you dying,
I will grasp your hand to the last, old friend.

We have had both pleasure and grief together,
You have seen my tears and have heard my song,
We have walked in cold and in sunny weather,
And I have been glad of your help so long.

So long? It was only in times of sorrow
The days passed slowly. To me it seems
You came but yesterday, leave to-morrow,
Flashing away like the sun's swift beams.

But you taught some things that were worth the learning.
I hide your secrets within my heart,
And thank you for them. At last, discerning
The fainter lines, I have conned my part.

Your voice of courage has made me bolder,
Your hand upon me has madd me weak;
After your stay I am growing older
And nearer yet to the goal I seek.

And yet I am glad to have known you, truly,
Although you have wrathfully torn away
Somethings that I clung to, and shown me duly,
My sin or failure with every day.

You have brought more often the Father's blessing,
And whispered peace to my troubled soul,
And seen me hopefully closely pressing
To him who only can make me whole.

And now—oh friend, you can scarcely hear me!
You can do nothing but faint and die!
A form that is youthful and fair draws near me
And bells are ringing, Old year, good-bye!

May God forgive me all faults, vows broken,
Fresh sins committed, wrath, hate and fear,
And give to me as his pardon-token
The first bright days of a better year.

—Marianne Farningham.

OUR BOYS.

The boy is the future man in short pants. A boy has thoughts, feelings, hopes, aims, and ambitions, though his face be dirty, his pants torn at the knees, and his toes looking out of his shoes. Too often the boy is cuffed about, made to feel that he is in the way in the house, and that he is a sort of Arab in the street. He is sent away from company, and made to feel that he is not wanted around. Too often churches neglect the boys, and teachers do not see in them the coming men. "It is only a boy converted" at the meetings. Ah! but what power in a boy beginning to live for God, consecrating his life to Christ. What years of good works in him? Let us look well to our boys.

FUTURE MEN AND WOMEN.

The boys and girls are what the men and women will be by and by. The good sisters make the good wives, and the good brothers make the good husbands of the after time. If you want to know with a fair certainty what each will be in the unalterable relation and solemn responsibilities of married life, you can see it all mirrored in the life that as child and youth they led. The affectionate kindness, considerate attention and unselfish devotion which made brother and sister bear to each other, and made the home calm and beautiful, will not have exhausted themselves when the old home is left, but on nearer and dearer ones will pour out their treasures of grace and goodness.

THE RUM MAELSTROM.

Out in the sea, off the coast of Norway, is this great oceanic whirlpool, like an hundred Niagaras converging together to pour themselves down into some bottomless pit. Far off on the ocean, many miles, the dreadful suction is felt; and driftwood, trees, boats, or even ships, are drawn with terrific speed into the hopeless mouth of this merciless maelstrom. One time a bear, swimming across to an island, was caught in the current, and was swept out into this awful whirlpool, while its wild, pitiless wail howled above the waves and remorseless torrent. Here the hapless sailor has drifted to his doom; a last prayer; a cry of despair echoing over the waves and he is gone. Sad, indeed. But sadder yet are moral maelstroms on the sea of life. Rum is the terrific maelstrom in our country, and thousands of our young men are being drawn into it to their doom. Every saloon is a boatload hurrying downward to death and despair. Moral suasion calls out, "Men, ahoy! Danger ahead! To the oars for your life." High license says, "Only so many boat loads are allowed to drift down to doom." Prohibition says, "Banish the rum maelstrom, and deliver lifecrafts from peril on the sea of time." And every man who has a spark of religion or a farthing's worth of manhood, will vote for the Prohibitory amendment.

THE COMING RACE.

It is through mighty addition of foreign population to our native population that I think God is going to fill this land with a race of people 95 per cent. superior to any thing the world has seen. Intermarriage of families and intermarriage of nations is depressing and crippling. Marriage outside of one's own nationality and with another style of nationality is a mighty gain. What makes the Scotch-Irish second to no pedigree for brain and stamina of character, so that blood goes right up to supreme court bench and to the front rank in jurisprudence and merchandise and art? Because nothing under heaven can be more unlike a Scotchman and an Irishman, and the descendants of these two conjoined nationalities, unless rum flings them, go right to the tip top in everything. All nationalities coming to this land the opposites will all the while be affianced, and French and German will unite and that will stop all the quarrel between them, and one child they will call Alsace and the other Lorraine. And hot-blooded Spaniard will unite with cold-blooded Polander, and romantic Italian with matter-of-fact Norwegian, and a hundred and fifty years from now the race occupying this land will be in stature, in purity of complexion, in liquidity of eye, in gracefulness of poise, in dome like brow, in taste, in intelligence and in morals so far ahead of anything now known on either side of the seas that this last quarter of the nineteenth century will seem to them like the Dark Ages. Oh, then how they will legislate and bargain and pray and preach and govern! This is the land where by the mingling of races the race prejudice is to get its death-blow.—Talmage.

"Raise the Standard Higher."

When the Lord Christ came to earth to show us the Father he not only taught as one having authority, but he also wrought as man never did. He took upon himself our nature, and that in its lowliest conditions. Though rich, he emptied himself, became poor. He lived, loved, labored, suffered and died—"gave himself for us that he might redeem us from our iniquity and purify unto himself a peculiar people." He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. Not simply to display his power and receive the praise of men, but to impart life, to do good. The end sought was worthy the effort, and the result amply justified the mighty outlay of infinite love and power. There was no misspent force, not an iota of it lost. He is to "see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied." True life is reproductive, and that Life of life has been reproduced in the living Church, "which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all." Christ did not simply give a pattern for the Church, as that which the Lord gave to Moses concerning the tabernacle, and require men to build or organize it after this or that fashion. While it is called a "house," yet it is the house of God. It is more, it is a life, a body, born out of His infinite heart of love. It is his body, life of his life, guided by his wisdom, animated by and breathing His Spirit, and carrying on His work of self-sacrifice and suffering for the salvation of men. "Purified unto himself, a peculiar people, zealous of good works." "Greater works than these shall ye do, because I go to my Father."

Two thoughts impress us most particularly as we pen these lines. The first is, that as individual members of this body, the life of the Lord is to be reproduced and exemplified in us. As he was crucified so we are to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts. As he made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, so we are to deny self and love mercy and walk humbly with God. Henceforth we are not to live unto self, but unto Him who died for us and rose again. The great apostle said: "I die daily." "I bear in my body the dying of the Lord Jesus." "Christ is magnified in my body." "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live." There was no formality about him. His soul was surcharged with love for Christ and with Christ's love for men. There was heart-yearning, soul-travail, intense agony and entreaty for the salvation of men. "As though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead be ye reconciled to God." With what tender solicitude he watched over and nourished the individuals and churches that were the fruit of his ministry.

The next thought is, that while our spiritual life comes from the one source, yet as individuals, and particularly as ministers, we impress our personality upon, and in a large measure type the life of the congregations and the individuals to whom we minister. "Like priest, like people." We cannot lead others nearer to God than we are. If there is a deep consecration, a fullness of life, a holy fervor, a consuming zeal for the cause of God in the preacher, the people catch the contagion and sinners are converted to God. If cold and perfunctory in the discharge of his duties, it may be even in holding what we call revival services, then the same rule applies. Spiritual life is at a low ebb. There are few conversions.

As in the providence of God, we are here at the beginnings of history, laying the foundations, where we will give caste very largely to the spiritual agencies and activities of this great Northwest for generations yet to come, how important that we consider well the measure of our obligation; that we have on "the whole armor of God," while we "stand against the wiles of the devil," and possess the "fullness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ" as we minister to dying men. "Who is sufficient for these things?" Yet he who uttered these words also shouted, "Thanks be unto God which causeth us always to triumph in Christ, and makest manifest by us the savor of his knowledge in every place."

In the language of Daniel A. Leeper, a holy man of God, once a member of the Missouri Conference, uttered just after beholding a soul-enrapturing vision of the heavenly and just, before he fell in sleep: let us "raise the standard higher;" and may the great Head of the militant host lead us forth conquering and to conquer.

News Notes.

St. Louis Methodism has made a grand forward movement. At a recent meeting of the pastors and official members of our church there it was decided to raise $200,000 for Church Extension and City Mission Work. The sum to be subscribed and paid in ten annual installments, thus giving $20,000 a year to be spent in this work. One church subscribed $95,000, two men offering to pay $15,000 each. The St. Louis "Advocate" says, that our church there is united as never before and this movement will place it in the lead of every other church in that great city. We trust that a consecrated talent is at hand to properly utilize these munificent material gifts.

France is in a furore over the great Panama canal swindle. Many of the leading officials of the government, including the son of De Lesseps, have been implicated and arrested. A revolution is feared. We trust there is honesty and good sense in that great nation, however, to tide over the trouble, and that the ship of state will soon right itself. This trouble will not be favorable to the Nicaragua canal scheme now before our Congress.

A proposition before Congress to suspend immigration for one year, to guard against the cholera scourge, has caused the great transportation lines to threaten a general boycott by diverting foreign travel from New York, Boston, and New Orleans, to Halifax. It may prove a blessing in the end by stimulating the construction of American merchant ships and the extension of American commerce. This immense traffic has heretofore been carried on by foreigners, and the money, therefore, left on the other side of the sea.

Mr. Phillip D. Armour has given to the city of Chicago his Armour Mission and Armour Institute, with an endowment of nearly a million and a half dollars for their support. The Mission building alone cost $250,000. It is a munificent gift, and the owner has shown remarkably good sense in not waiting until he is dead to have his wishes carried into execution.

At a mass meeting held recently in Chicago in the interest of Sunday closing of the World's Fair the house was packed purposely by Seventh Day Adventists, and when the resolutions were voted upon there was, of course, a majority against them. As well might Ingersoll and his hordes of saloon-bummers have been there and voted, as for these pestilential opposers of our Christian Sabbath. If they want to observe Saturday for Sunday at home, it is their privilege, but to lend their influence to infidels and anarchists, and such like, to defeat the efforts made to secure the recognition of a day of rest at this great gathering, just because it is not the particular period preferred by them, reveals a degree of narrowness and bigotry that is deplorable indeed. We have no patience with it.

We notice in a recent number of the "Pacific Methodist Advocate" a biographical sketch of Rev. T. D. Clanton, who departed this life in October. We remember seeing him at a camp meeting near Knoxville, Mo., about the year 1854 or '55. We were but a boy, yet he made an impression by his pleasant face, earnest manner, and his excellent singing that has remained through all these years. Peace to his ashes.

In his article on the "Parliament of Religions," Bishop Haygood utters these truthful and forceful words:

"Why should the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, care for representation there—in that crowd? Why should we be longing for "recognition" at Chicago—in this Congress of all sorts, from Methodists down to Asiatic idolaters?

It is true that the outside world has not recognized this Methodist Episcopal Church, South; but God has recognized us, and during the last twenty five years no Church has grown so fast. This itching to be seen and known and recognized of men is not wholesome. If we will only stand by our work of saving souls; if we will only repent of the worldliness that is spreading among us like a fretting leprosy; if we will only return to the simplicity and earnestness of our Methodism, we need not worry about being in this Chicago game of brag. A thousand revivals of religion—'pure and undefiled'—between now and September, 1893, will be worth more to us than the recognition of all the world."

Gilderoy, in writing to the New Orleans "Advocate," some notes of the Mississippi Conference, has this item:

"When Tubby, the full-blooded Choctaw Indian, up for admission on trial, told the story of his life, the glory of the Lord filled the place where we were assembled. It was the old story told by all who have gone from sin to salvation—a state of sin; conviction by the Holy Ghost; genuine repentance wrought in the heart by the Spirit; faith inspired by the Spirit; regenerated by the Holy Ghost; a conscious experience of pardoned sin and a call from God to preach."

It is a wholesome indication to see the religion that we preach and profess taking hold of the people of different tribes and tongues who happen to be residing in our midst. We have often lamented that more was not being accomplished for the Christianization of the Indians and Chinamen here in our Northwest.

A Reasonable Proposition.

By a Layman.

I have a proposition to make to the readers of the "Montana Methodist" which I hope they will both hear and heed. We now have a weekly religious paper. It meets a long-felt want, and is giving general satisfaction. It is the cheapest weekly paper that I know of in our church—only one dollar a year. The change to a weekly doubles the work of our editor, increases the expense of publication, for which he, as general manager, is responsible, while the price to subscribers remains the same. Now, we as subscribers must rally to his help and bear part of this burden. I propose to be one of five hundred, or more, to double my subscription to the paper. I am now paying for three copies, and I propose to procure either three new subscribers among my friends or to pay for as many more papers. How many will do the same, subscribe for one, two, three, five, or ten extra copies? This will not require a great effort, and it will afford great relief at once to our editor and business manager and also greatly extend the circulation and increase the usefulness of a paper of which we have a right to feel proud. Let us act in this matter, and do it without delay. I hope Brother Stanley will have to work day and night to record the subscriptions that will be sent to him during the next ten days. Address him at, Corvallis, Montana.

H. B. Bell.

Statistics of railway construction in 1892 in the Railway Age shows that during the past 12 months 4,062 miles of track was laid on 289 lines in 43 states and territories, slightly less than the total for 1889-1891. The total mileage of the country is now 173,663.

Notes and Personals.

—Mr. Robert Squires, brother of our Presiding Elder, is now at Olive, California. He likes the country, and thinks his health some better now. His wife (who is the sister of Sister Squires) and family are still in Missouri. We trust that our brother may find a country and climate that will be favorable to his health, and that he may yet have long life and see glad days on the earth. If the Lord should will otherwise, he doubtless possess a title indisputable to an inheritance in that "better country."

—Sister Squires writes that some old Missouri friends remembered them by sending a fine box of honey for a Christmas present. Would that we were there to rejoice with them. But we rejoice, even as it is. Many of our people in the church at home, in the east or south, who have preacher friends on the border, could, without any great personal effort, make hearts happy by sending a "Christmas box," pre paid, to some faithful itinerant and his family, in the west or northwest. It does not need to be a fine box of honey in every case. Let this be a gentle reminder to some of our eastern subscribers.

—Bro. S. Tuttle, one of our staunch Methodists at Fish Creek, Mont., renews his subscription for the "Methodist," and adds: "I am pleased to know that our paper has got to be a weekly, so that those who can't go to church every Sunday, can have a home Christian paper to read. It should be a great blessing to all the Christians of the state."

Yes, we believe that a home religious paper will do much good among our country people in the northwest. To assist in this direction, we hope to publish occasionally a short sermon from one of our home preachers. Who will help us in making the "Methodist" a blessing to all the Christians in the state? If each one of our friends will secure an additional subscriber or send the paper to some friends, it will greatly assist in the work.

—We hope that the preachers in Brother Howard's district will not wait till the revival meetings are over before writing us. Now that the fight is on, the battle is raging, our people are anxious to know how it is going. During the civil strife years ago, we noticed that the bulletins from the front were read with greater avidity than any other news, especially when they announced advances along the lines. So eager hearts, eyes, ears all over our great church are longing, looking and listening for notes of victory from the northwest. That is what our paper is for. These little bulletins will cheer other comrades, arouse lethargy, and inspire to valorous deeds. Brother, how is the battle progressing on your part of the field this week? Send us a postal.

—We greatly rejoice at the good news sent us by Brother Fancher. It is refreshing. But, to tell the truth, we expected it. May the good work go forward.

—We are pleased to announce that our brother, J. W. Winslett, of Stevensville, who was so near death's door some time ago, is recovering. He has been confined to his bed and room for three months, but is beginning to get around on crutches. We rejoice also that Brother Hensley, of Deer Lodge, has recovered. May these venerable brethren realize that the Lord has some important work for them to do yet before they go home, and may they have the grace and strength to do it.

—The last issue of the "Montana Christian Advocate" contains a well executed cut of our old time friend and brother, Rev. W. W. Van Orsdel, superintendent of the North Montana Mission of the M. E. Church, together with a full-page sketch of his life and labors, by Rev. Geo. Comfort. The picture is true to nature, and the sketch a worthy tribute to a worthy workman. His coming to Montana was doubtless of the Lord. He has a wonderful history. He came the year after we did. We soon made his acquaintance, and have been associated with him in journeyings oft, and in labors abundant, and together have witnessed many times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Though he came to Montana without purse or scrip, on foot, and without education, yet many years ago we recognized in him the main pillar and life of his church in Montana. He is a plain, simple-hearted, earnest Christian, "full of the Holy Ghost and of faith, and much people are added to the Lord" wherever he goes.

—When the matter of the proposed "parliament of religions" was first mooted, we thought we saw nothing but inconsistency in it, and spoke our mind in positive terms. As so many of the religious papers have endorsed it, some of the organs of our own church among them, we began to feel that we were, as has been the case frequently in other issues, in a hopeless minority. But now comes Bishop Haygood, who had been named as one of the principal performers in the parliament, and in his usually masterly manner, in the columns of the "Nashville Advocate" opposes it "teeth and toe-nail," and shows the utter incongruity and absurdity of the entire scheme. We believe it to be a fraud of the first mote, and are happy to find that we are in such good company. The Bishop says he has been "nominated" as one of the speakers, but he sincerely hopes he will not be "elected."

The Dance of Death.

On the night of the 23d ult., at a dance at Fly's Bridge in the Gallatin Valley, a man by the name of Vaughn quarreled with, knocked down and then shot and killed a young man named McDonald, and at this writing he has not been captured, though the sheriff is in hot pursuit of the fugitive. The men were said to have been good friends before, but were "under the influence of liquor and quarreled over a supper ticket." A dance, drunkenness, deadly weapons, a dead man, and a deadly feud developed in a peaceable community, that may result in the destruction of other lives. The dance continued till daylight, and yet people say there is no harm in the dance; innocent amusement, and a good place for Christian people to go, ect. From the time that John the Baptist, the best man that ever lived, next to our Lord, whose herald he was, was beheaded as the result of a dance, down to the present time, death, in some shape or other, has been in it. It may not come so quickly in every case, or just in the same manner as in this case, but death—death to spiritual life, death to purity of thought and sentiment; to the holier sensibilities and emotions of the soul and the monitions of a quickened conscience are sure to come if it is persisted. Again, in all kindness, but with all candor and earnestness, we urge our young friends to beware of it. It has been truly characterized the "dance of death."

To our friends who seem not to be able to find our address we wish to say that it is on the 8th page of the paper and is Corvallis, Montana.

The Coming Race.

It is through mighty addition of foreign population to our native population that, I think, God is going to fill this land with a race of people far superior to anything the world has seen. Intermarriage of families and intermarriage of nations is depressing and crippling. Marriage outside of one's own nationality and with another style of nationality is a mighty gain. What makes the Scotch-Irish second to no pedigree for brain and stamina of character, so that blood goes right up to the supreme court bench and to the front rank in jurisprudence and merchandise and art? Because nothing under heaven can be more unlike a Scotchman and an Irishman, and the decendants of these two conjoined nationalities, unless rum ruins them, go right to the tip top in everything. All nationalities coming to this land, the opposites will all the while be affianced, and French and German will unite and that will stop all the quarrel between them, and one child they will call Alsace and the other Lorraine. And hot-blooded Spaniard will unite with cold-blooded Polander, and romantic Italian with matter-of-fact Norwegian, and a hundred and fifty years from now the race occupying this land will be in stature, in purity of complexion, in liquidity of eye, in gracefulness of poise, in dome like brow, in taste, in intelligence and in morals so far ahead of anything now known on either side of the seas that this last quarter of the nineteenth century will seem to them like the Dark Ages. Oh, then, how they will legislate and bargain and pray and preach and govern! This is the land where by the mingling of races the race prejudice is to get its death-blow.—Talmage.

Vice Sets its Seal.

A writer on social purity says that even impure thoughts, habitually indulged, may be revealed by a permanent change in the expression of the countenance. Though a man imagines that no one suspects what is passing in his mind, the lines of his face may become so altered by foul imaginations that even men of the world say, they "somehow don't like that fellow." We read that "the books shall be opened." They are being opened now, for the record of a man's inmost thoughts is legibly spread on the open page of his countenance, and though he thinks not of it, he may already be delivered over to "everlasting shame and contempt."—Ex.

Haggai II. 1-9.

ENCOURAGING THE PEOPLE.

BY REV. J. Q. A. CURRY.

CONNECTING LINKS.

Alas! how soon the shoutings and jubilations of the temple builders are drowned in the doleful mutterings of discouragements and despondency. Their heathen and semi-heathen neighbors, with whom the King of Babylon had peopled the land when the Jews were carried away into captivity, gave these enthusiastic newcomers no little trouble. They first proposed to assist the Jews in the construction of the temple and rebuilding the walls of the city. But the Jews in their exile had learned by sad experience the folly of their past mistakes in compromising their religious convictions and principles with their idolatrous neighbors. The price of this lesson was too great for them to fall into the same error again, their offer was therefore promptly rejected. As might be expected, this gave offense. Every possible method was used by their enemies to obstruct and prevent the prosecution of the work. Upon the death of Cyrus letters were sent to his successors by these enemies to secure the royal disapproval of the project, and with some success. Fortunately, however, a more considerate monarch soon ascended the throne. About fifteen years were spent in dilly-dallying. But the Lord sent two of His fiery prophets among the people to awaken them from the slough of despondency into which they had fallen. Haggai and Zechariah succeeded in arousing the people into action. As a reward of their labor the sound of the ax and hammer is once more heard in the forrest and quarry. Read Ezra, chapters 4 and 5.

I. A MESSAGE FROM THE LORD.

"HAGGAI" was possibly an old man and may have seen the old temple before its destruction. To him "CAME THE WORD OF THE LORD" that was intended to call Israel to work. Jehovah communicates his message to the people through human lips. With such a message the prophet can but "SPEAK NOW" that the people may hear. Every Sunday school teacher should come to his class with "the word of the Lord" from a burning heart. "TO ZERUBBABEL.....AND TO JOSHUA..... AND TO THE PEOPLE." This is a personal message, to rank and file alike; to prince and priest and peasant. Every individual is made to feel a personal responsibility in this important work. Moreover each individual is assured of the personal interest of Jehovah in them, from the least unto the greatest. The INDIVIDUAL is not lost in the great mass of humanity. God's eye is upon each one and His ear is open to their cry "WHO..... SAW THIS HOUSE IN HER FIRST GLORY." No doubt some were in that number who had seen Solomon's temple in its matchless "GLORY." About $15,000 000 in gold was required to overlay the Holy of Holies alone. Not to speak of the embellishments of the rest of the building. This new temple is "IN COMPARISON OF IT (Solomon's temple) AS NOTHING." How humiliating. What a scathing rebuke! They are contentedly building themselves "ceiled houses", (Hag. i. 4) while the Lord's house is shabbily built, comparatively. This severe "COMPARISON" enables them to see, too, how much they have lost by their backsliding. Might-have-been is a severe but just task master.

"BE STRONG, O ZERUBBABEL..... O JOSHUA.....AND.....ALL YE PEOPLE." Unless we are willing to use the strength WE HAVE it ill becomes us to call upon God for help. Too many are like the debris on the bank of a stream waiting for a flood to lift and launch them out upon its resistless tide. Or like the lobster that has been thrown ashore, who lazily lies waiting for some friendly wave to bear it back to its native element, instead of using its legs to bring it back to its home. "AND WORK." Strength is given for USE. Strength legitimately used will prove a paying investment. Moreover, there is no rest where there is no labor. The sluggard never tastes of the sweetness of rest.

II. WORDS OF ENCOURAGEMEMT.

"FOR I AM WITH YOU." This promise and assurance follows the call to work. "I'll loose my camel and trust", said the thoughtless Arab; the pious dervish who overheard him promptly responded, "Tie your camel and trust." "I am with you." Whom? Ye that WORK. Others have no claim upon Him. "THE WORD THAT I COVENANTED WITH YOU WHEN YE CAME OUT OF EGYPT." God's word is immutable. If we will fill the conditions, He will do the rest. The fact that God HAS helped His people is sufficient guarantee for the present and the future. "FEAR YE NOT." What occasion is there to fear since God has declared, "MY SPIRIT REMAINETH AMONG YOU." Notwithstanding Israel's wickedness, so that the Lord withdrew His Shekinah and permitted them to be carried into captivity, yet His Spirit remained with them. God's mercy and forbearance toward us is wonderful. Though on account of our sins He is compelled to hide his face from us, yet he does not entirely abandon us.

III. WORDS OF PROMISE.

"I WILL SHAKE THE HEAVENS, AND THE EARTH, AND THE SEA, AND THE DRY LAND." This is figurative language, having reference to political commotions and convulsions. The first claimant to universal empire was Babylon. This had already fallen and upon its ruins the Medo-Persian power reared her gilded throne. The words of the prophet, "I WILL SHAKE ALL NATIONS", is being fulfilled. Scarcely had the Medo-Persian empire began to realize a sense of security when "the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land," of the political world became convulsed by the conquering tread of the young Monarch from Macedon, Alexander the Great. At his premature death, the new empire fell to pieces, and the earth and sea was drenched in blood by his jealous rivals. Thus the way was paved for the founding of the fourth and last great world empire. Rome stretched her dominions East, West, North, and South and more nearly than any of her predecessors could make her boast of world-wide dominion. In all this winning and waning of empire the world became sick at heart. "THE DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS" is for something permanent and abiding. This desire personified is CHRIST. And the prophetic cravings of the human heart for universal empire will be realized in His kingdom, for it shall never be destroyed. "I WILL FILL THIS HOUSE WITH GLORY." As insignificant as it may seem now, yet the King of glory shall grace it with His Presence. "THE GLORY OF THIS LATTER HOUSE SHALL BE GREATER THAN OF THE FORMER." Within its sacred precincts resounded the voice of Him who speaks as never man spake. The promise is not that it shall be greater in BEAUTY, or SIZE, or WEALTH but in GLORY. The temple and its services symbolized the Messianic Kingdom, which is to redeem and rule the world. IN THIS PLACE WILL I GIVE PEACE." Here the Prince of Peace paid the ransom price that will secure to every child of Adam who will accept it that peace that is as calm as a river.

The Lower Light.

SELECTED.

A missionary, while crossing the ocean on his way to India, was overtaken one night by a violent storm. The wind blew, and the mighty waves rose and threatened to engulf the straining ship. All passengers were ordered below and for a time there was great consternation and fear for the safety of the vessel. At the height of the tempest there was the sound of rushing feet on deck, and loud cries of: "Man overboard!" were heard. The passengers hastened above, all but the missionary. He hesitated a moment and thought: "Of what service can I be now? I shall only be in the way on deck." And then his eye fell on the little bull's-eye window in the cabin, and, seizing a lantern hanging near by, he held it up to the window. Soon a shout was heard: "There he is! there he is!" and before long the man was safely brought to the vessel. The next day the missionary learned that his little light had cast its tiny ray directly upon the dying man, so that the sailors were able to see where to throw the line. "Let the lower lights be burning," for ye know not when "some fainting, struggling seaman you may rescue, you may save."

The Theme of the Bible is Christ.

Christ is everything in the Bible. I do not care where I open the Bible I find Jesus. In whatever path I start I come, after awhile, to the Bethlehem manger. I go back to the old dispensation and see a lamb on the altar, and say: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world!" Then I go and see the manna provided for the Israelites in the wilderness, and say: "Jesus, the bread of life." Then I look at the rock which was smitten by the prophet's rod, and, as the water gushes out, I say: "It is Jesus, the fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness." I go back and look at the writings of Job, and hear him exclaim: "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Then I go to Ezekiel, and I find Christ presented there as "a plant of renown;" and then I turn over to Isaiah, and Christ is spoken of "as a sheep before shearers." It is Jesus all the way between Genesis and Malachi. Then I turn over to the New Testament, and it is Christ in the parable, it is Christ in the miracle, it is Christ in the evangelist's story, it is Christ in the apostle's epistles, and it is Christ in the trumpet peal of the Apocalypse.—Talmage.

The Week Lengthened.

We would not take a pessimistic view of the moral condition of young men. Though we have written about young men as gamblers and criminals in general, we see a bright side to the picture of young manhood in this country. The reports we have received concerning the services of prayer in behalf of young men held throughout the world recently show that many thousands have been gathered into the Church aud redeemed for honorable living. Another result of the week of prayer was the giving of a considerable sum of money by young men to the cause of Jesus Christ. Still another important gain for the Lord's work is the deeper consecration of young men in their work in behalf of their fellows. These thoughts give hope for the future; they give promise that some of the criminal young men will be redeemed to God and society; they are a prediction that this country will the more surely be a center of evangelizing power for the world and that young men everywhere will be better from this time on. But that the ground gained may not be lost, let the week of prayer be extended to a year of prayer; let the "special effort" become a general effort—general because constant, but special because intense effort be directed toward individual young men. "This one thing I do." One by one we may gather in the recruits who will unite in an irresistible army that will march forward for the rescue of young men from the snares of intemperance, the gambling table and lives of impurity. None can do this work so well as the Christian young men of America.—Young Men's Era.

Field Notes.

From Heppner, Oregon.

Edwin Palmer:–Our Quarterly Conference has just been held. Our old time friend and conference eclass mate Rev. M. V. Howard, presided. He magnifies his office and reflects credit upon the "fifth wheel." We have been treated by the presence and preaching of Rev's Kirk and Adkins, recently. Methodist preachers everywhere are earnest, consecrated, self-sacrificing men. But from the knowledge we have of the brethren of the East Columbia Conference, they surpass any we have before known, in these qualities. "They have their reward." We are now protracting. The Lord bless the faithful of this station and everywhere.

From Butte.

In a private letter Brother Alton writes from Butte;

Our work at Butte prosperous; congregations very good. We organized an Epworth League. Have now twenty members. The young folks take hold very well.

Stevensville.

It was our privilege to attend the Christmas exercises in connection with the Sunday-school of our church at Stevensville, which were held at half past three o'clock on Saturday before Christmas. The occasion was a complete success in every particular, and a great triumph for our cause there. The music, led by Mrs. Dr. Wells, was most excellent, while the recitations by the children and young people were of an excellent quality and well rendered. The distribution of the presents gave general satisfaction. The house was well filled. Everybody was happy. It was the first entertainment of the the kind ever attempted by our own school. W. O. Waggener, the pastor, and H. B. Bell, the superintendent, and all who aided them so nobly by liberal contributions and untiring labors, have reason to be congratulated upon the successful carrying out of their plans.

Bozeman.

A friend writing of the meeting at this place says pleasant things about Brother and Sister Tabor, states that six or seven were forward for prayers and there is a good prospect for a general awakening among those whom our church is able to reach there. Brother Shaeffer was expected to assist in the meeting.

Rosalia, Wash.

H. B. Terry:—Christmas greeting! Glorious day last Sunday at Thorn Creek. Baptized sister Cora Virginia Kelley and have the promise of □others. Good Sunday-school there, and congregations increasing all around the circuit. Paid our parsonage at Rosalia, out of debt this week—amount $80.25. So Brothers A. Y. Skee, and A. H. Crow will get a Christmas gift in the form of their old note. Christmas sermon at Oakesdale to-morrow. Expect to meet Brother Sam. E. Crow from Camas Prarie.

M. V. Howard, P. E.

Dear. Bro:—I receive the "Methodist" and read with interest. Have almost finished the first round on Pendleton Dist.

The work is moving up almost everywhere. When our revivals are closed you shall hear from us. Several are now in progress. We hope to meet you at our Dist. Conf., at Heppner.

We are glad to get the paper weekly, but, can you afford it?

May the blessing of the Lord attend your labors.

In love,
M. V. Howard.

From Weston, Ore.

W. M. Fancher:—I wish to expresss my appreciation of the "Montana Methodist." It's a jewel of the rarest sparkle. Could not do without it. "May its shadow never grow less." I noticed in your "Field Notes" that you prayed that Weston would soon replace the old parsonage with a new one. Now Brother, rejoice with us. Your prayer was answered ere we knew you nad prayed for it.—God knew it. We thank you Bro. for the interest you feel in us. God bless you.

We have now a house 27x27 feet with 6 rooms, built on the church ground. Would have been in it now, but we get Portland lumber, and we are delayed for flooring, but hope to get in next week. Thank the Lord and the energetic brethren and sisters. (A better class of Christians would be hard to find anywhere.) But somehow I always get a good work. thank the Lord. We are doing well in all lines of church work; the S. S. is splendid under the supervision of Bro's Davis and Hite. Praise service good; Choir first class, Bro. Davis leading and Miss Eva. Wishard, organist. The parsonage O. K., thanks to Bro's Price, Surdam, Hickman, and McBride. The Woman's Home and Parsonage interest is well up. The Lord and Jonah are running the other business. Our congregations average 200 at evening service. The last prayer meeting 42; Sunday-school 69. We have service every Sabbath evening. Had two good accessions last Sabbath from the Society of Friends. The Brethren voted me a salary of $500.00, which they pay monthly; no wonder I think Weston a good place.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Deer Lodge.

Deer Lodge, Mont., Dec. 22, 1892.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—As I am so disappointed that the "Presiding Elder" did not come in on the five o'clock train I will take my spite out on writing some. This has been a cold week and myself the only one to keep fires aglow, as Mr. Squires puts most of his time in with the preachers.

A letter received from the young man (Bro. Noland) who goes to Wallace, is on his way from South Carolina to that place. He will think he has discovered the North Pole when he arrives and finds the snow so deep and the weather so cold. He comes well spoken of by the Bishop. So we will have two single preachers in the conference then; but how long will they remain in that state of blessedness?

In the 'Rocky Mountain Methodist" this week we read of the death of one of our best friends at Walsinburg—Hon. R. A. Quillian, a good staunch member of our church at that place. But "we know where to find him." God bless the dear, good wife and four children who will remember their father's holy life and follow in his footsteps. One by one we read of the going of our old friends in other lands and wonder who will be the next. On whose head-stone will be chiseled the year 1893?

How like it should be, to have our own conference paper come every week! Now let the preachers learn how to write. Have Bros. Goulder and Alton get up a writing school and let the men be compelled to learn to wield the instrument that is mightier than the sword. Then our editor would not have such a time as the elder in obtaining frequent and correct reports.

Now I have a big house for a little family, so will ask you to send your good wife and little ones over here to stay awhile with me, for she and I were good friends in old Howard about ten years ago. We are growing old and our "better halves" are older.

But enough for the old year. I may do better after resolution time.

With well wishes I remain,
Mrs. J. E. Squires.

An Evening in the House of Commons.

BY BISHOP GALLOWAY.

Parliament had been in session several days, the debate on the Queen's speech had about concluded, and the final vote was to take place that night, which would decide the fate of the government. It was, of course, well understood that the decision would be in favor of Mr. Gladstone, and that he would at once be summoned by the Queen to form a new Ministry. But the interest was intense, and excited groups of leading politicians in the parlors and libraries of the clubs were discussing the situation.

At six o'clock, by appointment, I was at Westminster, elbowed my way through the eager crowd into St. Stephen's Hall, and sent my card to Mr. Illingworth. Since the famous Guy Fawkes affair—whose house, by the way, I saw up in Yorkshire—and the dynamite fright some years ago, the utmost precaution is exercised in admitting visitors. Only those can gain entrance—and a very limited number at best—who have the tickets, or personal escort of members; and the gallery accommodation is very meagre. Soon my friend appeared, and conducted me safely down the long corridor, by policemen and soldiers—passed two or more doorkeepers wearing medals or badges, up a stairway or two, and, much to my surprise and delight, into the "Peers' Gallery." I had the most eligible seat, in full view of the Speaker and the coveted "front benches" occupied by the government and opposition leaders. The Speaker, in full robes and wearing a long white wig, has an elevated seat beneath a small canopy, and at the desk just below are two or three clerks, also in robes and powdered wigs. Above the Speaker is the "Reporters' Gallery," and above that, to the rear, is the "Ladies' Gallery," screened by bars, or wire, through which the handsomely dressed, ambitious wives of statesmen were eagerly peering, and giving anxious attention to the debate in progress. To them social prestige was involved, while to their husbands and friends political triumph or defeat. The construction, equipment and general appearance of the Hall somewhat disappointed me—affording accommodation for only about two-thirds of the members elect. When all attend, as that night, some have to find seats in the side galleries, provided for visitors. There are no desks and most of the members sit with their hats on. When one arose, however, he doffed his beaver and held it in his hand. I heard some speeches, but failed to hear Mr. Chamberlain, who had already made his aggressive attack upon his former Liberal associates. The Solicitor-General and several others spoke to a thin house, and to me their speeches were rather commonplace. Of course, I was most anxious to see Mr. Gladstone—confessedly the most conspicuous figure in English statesmanship, and a name most highly honored the world over. Much to my gratification, the venerable leader soon came in and occupied his accustomed seat on the front bench. As he looked up at the galleries I caught the flash of his large brilliant eyes, whose youthful fire contrasted strangely with the furrows of age on brow and cheek. When he arose and moved to the Speaker's chair for a private conference his step seemed quite elastic, and as he walked out into the lobby his erect, martial figure had the expression of one born to rule—an unknighted chieftain, an uncrowned king. My reverence for this statesman of peerless genius and lofty, stainless character was heightened by that half-hour's personal study, whatever may be my views on the great issue he is championing with such consummate ability. Just opposite sat the young leader of the government and First Lord of the Treasury, Rt.-Hon. A. J. Balfour. Tall, thin, pale, with the brow of a philosopher and the clear eye of genius, that young man, not yet forty, is next to Mr. Gladstone, the most conspicuous and potential personality in the politics of Great Britain. He has possibly made more reputation in the past six years than any man in the nation, and is destined to fill a large place in history of his country. Many others were pointed out to me as the debate progressed; but of them I need not write.

After being conducted through the libraries, lobbies, corridors, dining-rooms, and down the great verandah which overlooks the Thames, with Lambeth Palace, the official residence of the Archbishop of Cantebury, just across the historic stream, we returned to St. James Park for dinner at half past eight o'clock. * * *

I return more in love with my native land and better satisfied that Providence has appointed us to the noblest national destiny.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

MILLIONS GO.—Mr. Herbert, of the British Legation, has just married Miss Gammell, of Newport, R. I., the possessor of inherited millions. A year or two since another Herbert of the legation married a rich Miss Wilson, of New York. A third million-heiress, Miss Pinchof, of New York, is to be married this week to a legation attache, Mr. Alan Johnstone. A newly arrived British legationer, a Mr. Paget, is the next one to be caught if millions can do it and they generally can. Why not put a prohibitory tariff on these fortunenate wooers or impose an export tariff on the rich girls? And why do the American boys allow these "blarsted Hinglish officials you know" who come to Washington, to carry off such marriage prizes? Is it because the girls are Anglo-maniacs? And is that the reason why so many foolish imitators of foreign foolishness appear on the streets and in society in this pr eminently National American city? Young men entitled to join the sons of the Revolution carry their canes by the middle, stick out their elbows and perangulate along in a gawky kangaroo style and shake hands with sympathetic friends on the level of their noses just like the foreign leader of fashion who had a boil under her high mightiness arm. No wonder American women prefer the real article to ridiculous imitators.

OLD WORLD TRAVEL takes much money out of the country yearly. Not the wealthy only but pastors, Government clerks, teachers and others with moderate income visit Europe in vacation, and a few go as far as Egypt and Palestine. In Syria, it is estimated that American tourists —not pilgrims—leave about $100,000 annually. This, of course, is a trifle, but a trifle which indicates the many millions that are spent in foreign travel.

THE JOPPA AND JERUSALEM railroad shortens by a few hours the time required to visit the sacred city, and will draw a few more busy travelers to that point. For some sentimentalists, however, it breaks a charm. Think of a railroad running hard by Calvary, with a depot in the neighborhood of Gethsemane! It is a virtual anarchonism. It reminds us of the pictures which Harper's Magazine once presented to its readers, representing the summits of Mt. Sinai divided into pastures by Virginia rail fences and Elijah cooking the meat the ravens brought him on a gridiron of modern pattern!

THE BLOOD OF GOATS with religious ceremonies were used by priests in hopes to sanctify the intrusion of the railroad on Mt. Zion. Was that better than the oft-repeated sacrifice of human life which high speed and grade crossings exact s yearly in this city without any religion or conscience? But let us not decry our Christian civilization. The railroad will educate the lazy, superstitious, ignorant Orient and will e uphasize there, as it does here, the doctrine that the sluggard, the drunkard, the unfaithful, the liar, the forgetter of his brother cannot inherit the Kingdom.

THE FRIENDS OF MR. BLAINE can no longer deceive themselves For months, and years even, their hopes and affection have kept them reporting that he was getting better. but he has steadily failed. Last Sunday night the newsboys cried "Blaine is dead" about the crowded church, on the steps of which he was prostrated years ago. The news was premature but all fear that the end can be delayed but a few hours.

CLEVELAND.—Meanwhile the President-elect has been in conference at New York with his most trusted confidential friends, Dickinson and Vilas, preparing to take up the affairs which Blaine has dropped and which his successor and Harrison must soon lay down.

Religious Intelligence.

There are 375 Sunday schools in New York City.

Thirteen million people in England are non-church-goers.

Native converts gave over $27,000 to mission work last year.

A church an hour, night and day, this is the record of dedications in America.

Eighteen of the London theaters are occupied for divine service on Sabbath evenings.

The last hundred years of missionary work has put the gospel and the Bible within the reach of 500,000,000 of the race.

Philadelphia has 280 Societies of Christian Endeavor in its local union. Cleveland has 103.

Rev. F. E. Clark, D. D., after a tour in China, Japan, India, and the countries farther east expects to reach England in June, 1893.

There have been 1,406 new societies of Christian Endeavor reported since the New York convention, making a present total of 22,486.

Baptist missionary forces abroad have been re-inforced by twenty-five persons who recently sailed. Sixteen to the Telugu mission in India, two to Assam, four to Burmah, and three to the Congo.

Another new church has been founded in the suburb of Berlin, through the efforts of the Empress.

There are so many Japanese in Shanghai, China, that quite a missionary work is being carried on among them.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Paris, France, thas recently taken possession of a splendid piece of property valued at $150,000.

The young people of the First Baptist church, Hartford, Conn., give $200 for missions this year.

Virginia and Vermont are among the last states in which the Baptist Young People's Union has been organized.

Hon. Rutherford B. Hayes will probably preside at the opening session of the international Epworth League conference, to be held at Cleveland, O., July 6 to 9. The address of welcome will be delivered by Gov. McKinley of Ohio.

Rev. E. A. Schell, pastor of the First M. E. Church, Younkers, N. Y., has been choosen general Sec'y of the Epworth Leavue. He will enter at once upon his duties. He was for a time pastor at Hammond and South Bend, Ind. He has a good reputation as a platform orator and is finely equipped for the duties of his new and responsible position.

Twenty years ago the people of New Guinea were all exceedingly fierce, wild cannibals. Now cannibalism and witchcraft are unknown; there are 70 mission stations, and six churches with about 700 members. The missionaries have translated portions of the Bible into six languages, and forty teachers have gone out from the two training institutions.

—o—

What are the Returns?

Will it pay?—is a fair question to ask the promoter of any enterprise requiring the investment of money. This query is as applicable to solicitations for benevolent objects as it is to business ventures involving promised dividends in commercial transactions. Does the investment of money in saloons and attendant iniquities yield returns in moral degradation and increase in vice? Does money which is made to multiply honorable business enterprises result in developing character and nobleness of life? As certainly as that some kinds of business degrade and others uplift men, so certainly must men take these results into account when making up the balance sheet which will show the debits and credits of life. This important question is not how many thousands or millions of dollars men leave when they die, but how much of glory to God stands to their credit on the books of the recording angel The amount of such heavenly credit is often strangely at variance with the financial rating in the commercial agencies of the world. The dividends in the widow's mite will enrich the poor woman with eternal and heavenly treasures, while the selfishly accumulated and selfishly used millions of the "rich fool" will pauperize his soul through all eternity.—Young Men's Era.

African Women.

The condition of African women is most degraded. A woman is practically a slave to her father or eldest male relative before marriage, and afterward to her husband. She is condemned to ceaseless toil in order to provide for the wants of the family. Added to this is the cruel practice of wife beating. A whip or scourge made of the hide of the hippopotamus, cut in tails at the end, hangs on the wall of every Guinea negro's hut, and is brought into use almost daily. In no heathen country are the women more ignorant, vicious, and utterly degraded than in this part of Africa.

This sad condition is largely due to the universal practice of polygamy. There is no limit except of means, to the number of wives a man may have. In fact he is considered wealthy or otherwise according to their number. There is usually one who is called the "chief" or "head" wife. She can tyrannize over the other wives as much as she pleases so long as she does not interfere with the authority of the so called husband, whose will is absolute. Favoritism on his part may make the lot of some of his women more endurable than that of others; but at the best it is an unenviable one and shows how greatly they need the civilizing influence of the Gospel of Christ.

Girls marry at twelve or even younger. Strange as it may seem, considering their ill-treatment, marriage is the goal of every native woman's ambitition. They have no form of marriage ceremony whatever. The payment of a certain sum or "dowry" by the man to the girl's father is the only thing required, and when that is fully paid he can claim his wife. Parents often betroth their children when very young, and, though the paying of the "dowry" may require several years, the bargain stands, for goods must be refunded if the girl's father wishes to cancel it. Through the whole transaction the girl herself has no choice allowed her.—Mrs. Wm. Swan.

Feeble Faith.

To-day the region is not so much of a battlefield as it is a hospital for sick and disabled folks; it is very often only a round of poultices and plaster and nourishing diet, where the talk is of troubles and trials and what we have to go through. I have met religion looking very unlike the warrior of the maiden martyr. A poor thing, coughing a feeble apology for its existence, and promising not to get into anybody's way if we will only let it alone; that shuts its eyes for fear of seeing what is wrong, and holds its tongue for fear of giving offence; a poor, sick, sighing thing that can do nothing in the world but sit by the fire nursing itself, creeping very occasionally into the sunshine when the wind is not in the east. There is much need that we add to our faith virtue—that we keep alive the spirit of daring—fearless, outspoken, determined. We need a religion that is a thorough nuisance to those who want to do wrong; with an eye like an eagle's for anything that is not straight, and making hideous noise about it such as will set the Pharisees grumbling indignantly. A courage that can not die, and can not be put down; that can be laughed at and starved if need be, but can not do other than the right, and speak other than the truth. There is much faith to-day, but we want this courage to go right out to live, and dare, and endure—in one word, we want a great enthusiasm for Jesus Christ.—Mark Guy Pearse.

Our Boys.

The boy is the future man in short pants. A boy has thoughts, feelings, hopes, aims, and ambitions, though his face be dirty, his pants torn at the knees, and his toes looking out of his shoes. Too often the boy is cuffed about, made to feel that he is in the way in the house, and that he is a sort of Arab in the street. He is sent away from company, and made to feel that he is not wanted around. Too often churches neglect the boys, and teachers do not see in them the coming men. "It is only a boy converted" at the meetings. Ah! but what power in a boy beginning to live for God, consecrating his life to Christ. What years of good works in him. Let us look well to our boys.—Ex.

The Rum Maelstrom.

Out in the sea, off the coast of Norway, is this great oceanic whirlpool, like an hundred Niagaras converging together to pour themselves down into some bottomless pit. Far off on the ocean, many miles, the dreadful suction is felt; and driftwood, trees, boats, or even ships, are drawn with terrific speed into the hopeless mouth of this merciless maelstrom. One time a bear, swimming across to an island, was caught in the current, and was swept out into this awful whirlpool, while its wild, pitiless wail howled above the waves and remorseless torrent. Here the hapless sailor has drifted to his doom; a last prayer; a cry of despair echoing over the waves and he is gone. Sad, indeed, but sadder yet are moral maelstroms on the sea of life. Rum is the terrific maelstrom in our country, and thousands of our young men are being drawn into it to their doom. Every saloon is a boat load hurrying downward to death and despair. Moral suasion calls out, "Men, ahoy! Danger ahead! To the oars for your life." High license says, "Only so many boat loads are allowed to drift down to doom." Prohibition says, "Banish the rum maelstrom, and deliver lifecrafts from peril on the sea of time."

What a Child's Kiss Can Do.

In a prison in New Bedford, Mass, there is a man whom we shall call Jim, and who is a prisoner on a life sentence. Up to last spring he was regarded as a desperate, dangerous man, ready for rebellion at any hour. He planned a general outbreak, and was "given away" by one of his conspirators. He plotted a general mutiny or rebellion, and was again betrayed. He then kept his own counsel. While never refusing to obey orders, he obeyed them like a man who only needed backing to make him refuse. One day in June a party of strangers came to the institution. One was an old gentleman the others ladies, and two of the ladies had small children. The guide took one of the children on his arm, and the other walked until the party began climbing stairs. Jim was working near by, sulky and morose as ever, when the guide said to him, ',Jim, won't you help this little girl upstairs?"

The convict hesitated, a scowl on his face, and the little girl held out her hands, and said, "If you will, I guess I'll kiss you." His scowl vanished in an instant, and he lifted the child as tenderly as a father. Half way upstairs she kissed him. At the head of the stairs she said, "Now you've got to kiss me, too."

He blushed like a woman, looked into her innocent face, and then kissed her cheek, and before he reached the foot of the stairs the man had tears in his eyes. Ever since that day he has been a changed man, and no one in the place gives less trouble. May be he has a little Katie of his own. No one knows, for he never reveals his inner life; but the change so quickly wrought by a child proves that he may forsake his evil ways, and seek pardon for his sins. Selected.

The Comfort of Giving.

A Methodist minister tells, in "The Treasury," an instructive story about giving. In one of his charges a good man regularly contributed every Lord's Day five dollars for the support of the Church, and as regularly a poor widow put in five cents, all she could spare, as she supported herself and six children by taking in washing. One day the former came to the minister and said that the latter ought not to pay anything, and that he would pay the five cents for her every week. The minister called to tell her of this offer, which he did as delicateately as he could. What was her reply as the tears started in her eyes? "Do they want to take from me the comfort I experience in giving to the Lord? Think how much I owe to Him. My health is good, my children keep well, and I receive so many blessings that I feel I could not live if I did not make my little offering to Jesus each week." How few can read this simple narrative without feeling rebuked for their insensibility to God's exceeding goodness.

TRUE EDUCATION.

We believe in education in the highest aud in the highest that can be attained, provided it is the right kind. This is an age of culture, and the man or woman who does not possess it in some considerable degree cannot hope to stand in the front and make himself felt in the great on-going of human affairs. Failing in early life in our cherished hope of securing that the lack of which has been an ever-increasing source of regret, we have not failed to urge every young person, especially every young minister, of our acquaintance to take full advantage of every opportunity to secure an education. It is necessary to direct successfully one's energies to the highest and noblest ends.

But there is much that passes for education that is only so-called. Education is not cramming. Neither is it simply the development of the mental faculties, or the cultivation of good manners. Knowledge is power, but it may be a power for evil as well as for good, just owing to the character of its possessor. Cultivate a crab apple till the crack of doom, and it remains a crab apple still. Knowledge does not necessarily make a man or woman virtuous. A rascal is all the more dangerous because of his knowledge and pleasing address. Alas! that there are so many such now-a-days. Man has a three-fold nature, intellectual, moral, physical. To develop or educate one of these at the expense of the other is to make him one-sided—a monstrosity. It does violence to his own nature, makes trouble by throwing him out of harmony with himself and with everything around him. It fits him for failure in the great work of life. If the physical nature alone is developed he becomes an athlete, a slugger, an educated animal. By cultivating the moral nature alone, he may become a religious fanatic, having "a zeal but not according to knowledge." If the mental faculties are developed at the expense of the moral or religions he becomes an atheist, an anarchist, ready to follow any device that gratifies greed, regardless of moral claims, or the rights of others, of which he knows nothing and for which he cares nothing. There is much of the so-called education to-day that seems to unfit men for the vocations in life for which nature and providence have prepared them. It renders them discontented with their lot and excites aspirations to something entirely beyond their capacity to attain. There is a fault somewhere. True education finds out what is best in human nature and develops that. It should seek to find the sphere for which nature and grace have prepared its subject and then devote its energies to help to-ward that end. Especially should it strive to make true men and true women of each and all. We some times fear that our system of teaching the higher branches in the public schools, besides working an in justice to the poor man by taxing him to teach branches which his own children are, for lack of capacity or time, unable to study (besides taking away his choice in the higher education of his children), is at fault here. Children get a smattering of book learning and aspire to be lawyers, authors, artists, or anything to make a living without manual labor, which they have cause to regard as beneath their dignity. The leading minds of the land are thinking closely along these lines. And well they may, for it affects the happiness, as well as the usefulness of countless thousands, also the future welfare of our country.

After all,' it is in the development of the spiritual, the inner nature, that the basis of true nobility and excellence is found. The Lord "desireth truth in the inward parts" and in the "hidden parts" he hath said he will make us to know wisdom—true wisdom, the wisdom that cometh down from above, that is pure, peaceable, long-suffering, easy to be entreated and full of good works. Here is true culture, true refinement—in having the mind, and being in harmony with Him who is "the Way, the Truth, the Life"—the only perfect Man who ever trod this earth, "this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." "Let not the rich man glory in his riches, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, neither let the wise man glory in his wisdom, but let him that glorieth, glory in this that he knoweth and understandeth me." "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." A culture that ignores the heart, the spiritual nature, and leaves God out of its thought is a curse instead of a blessing. The civilization begotten of it may attract and dazzle for a time, but like that of classic Greece and imperial Rome it will come to grief in the end.

Young man, young lady, is your efforts to secure an education, above all things, study to show yourself a "workman approved of God that needeth not to be ashamed." Then you will be prepared for the best society and for the highest endeavor in both worlds.

NEWS—NOTES.

On the second of January, 1893, Hon. J. E. Richards was duly installed at Helena as Governor of Montana, and A. C. Botkin, as Lieutenant Governor. Hon. W. Y. Pemberton succeeded Henry N. Blake as Chief Justice of Montana. Other State officers took the oath of office at the same time.

The Legislature of Montana met on the first Monday in this month. The Democrats had a decisive majority in the Senate, and that body organized without delay, and was soon ready for business. But at this writing the House has failed to effect an organization. We anticipate that there will be but little delay in the matter. There is much important business to transact, and it is to be hoped there will be nothing to hinder the work.

—It was refreshing to meet with Brother Shaeffer and his pleasant family—wife, son and daughter—and share their generous hospitality at the parsonage. While they find things quite different from what they were in Westport, yet they accept the situation cheerfully, and have made hosts of friends. Miss Bessie presides at the organ and takes an active part in the Sunday School work. We doubt not that before the year is out they will feel quite at home in their new field. They constitute a valuable and permanent addition to our Montana Methodism.

We felt quite welcome at the political home of Brother A. G. Clarke and wife, whose hospitality is unbounded. They knew how to make their guests feel at home. Sister Clarke's many friends will be glad to know that she is enjoying excellent health this winter.

We met Brother J. W. Kemper, of Butte, at the capital. He reports that the work at Butte, under the pastorate of Rev. F. Walton, is progressing finely. The house is getting too small to hold the congregations, particularly on special occasions. Brother Squires held quarterly meeting there New Years. His family accompanied him.

We hear excellent reports from private sources, of the successful labors of Brother R. S. Clark at Boulder. Quarterly meeting was to be held there on the second Sunday. We rejoice greatly at the success of our cause there.

It was a treat to meet and greet so many of our old frends in Helena. Many pleasant memories of long-gone days and years were recalled. When we first landed at Helena, twenty-one years ago, the carpenters were at work on the Grand street church. We remember well the thrill of joy we felt as we looked up at the building, with the scaffolding all around it, heard the sound of the hammers, and felt that it was to be a house for the Lord. With all its varied history we love it still, but much more the faithful and devoted men and women who worship at its altars. May we meet them, with those already gone before, in that temple not made with hands.

How we are thrilled at the glad news sent us that a promising young man at Bozeman is ready to consecrate himself to the ministry, to which he feels called of God. We praise God for this token of His presence and blessing. May the brother be abundantly useful. Let the church be much in prayer to God that many more may be raised up and thrust into the whitening fields.

From now until the first of March is perhaps the most favorable time for revival services during the entire year. Let every man be at his post, improve the time, and make full proof of his ministry, and may "showers of blessing" come upon the entire field.

How many good resolutions were made on the first day of the year. Strive to see how faithfully you can keep them, and may this prove the best and happiest year, thus far, of your life.

Whenever a man has not religion enough to prompt him to pay his honest debts or to convince his creditors that he is making every effort possible to do so, be he a minister, or church official in any other relation, then there is something seriously wrong. Let us have a revival of debt-paying religion. Then shall come the times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

This number of the "Methodist" is made up at Helena, and our mail from Corvallis has failed to reach us, which will possibly defer some publications intended for this issue. We are sorry for it. But they will be forth-comng next week. Let our friends continue to write, and don't forget to send some new subscribers.

Who will respond to Brother Bell's proposition in last week's issue, to double his subscription to the "Methodist?" Write quickly. We are in need of the cash right now.

Rev. F. F. St. Clair and wife rested on Sunday at Helena on their way from Washington as they were "going back to Dixie." They made many friends during their short stay, and we heard many kind references to the two earnest sermons that our brother preached in our church. May his health be speedily restored in that Georgia atmostphere, that his clarion voice may again ring out amid these mountains and through these valleys calling men from sin's destructive way.

The House organized on the second day by electing Mr. Matthews, a Populist, speaker. It is thought this will give the democrats a senator.

Rev. D. B. Price is stationed at Conway, Ark., where he is taking a course at college, in connection with his pastoral work. Private advances inform us that our brother is not any too highly elated over his removal from the Rockies.

A private letter from a Methodist in Savannah, Mo., to a friend in Helena says," I wish you could hear our preacher. He is one of the best we have ever had. The house is crowded every Sunday. Some say that he is the equal of Sam Jones."

Congratulations to our Brother Wailes, and to our people at Savannah. We well remember our visit to that place in 1869, on the accasion of a district conference, presided over by Rev. D. C. O'Howell. J. O. Mumpower was the popular pastor. We remember with much pleasure the hospitality and kindness of good Sister Hyde and family to a young preacher from the Kansas border, who was just buckling on the armor.

A VALUABLE VOLUME.

There has just come to our table a neat and substantially cloth-bound volume of 340 pages, entitled "Select Notes." It is a commentary on the International Lessons for 1893, explanatory, illustrative, doctrinal and practical; with illustrations, maps, pictures, chronology of the Acts, suggestive to teachers, literary references. It is by Rev. F. N. Peloubet, D. D., and M. A. Peloubet.

We have not given it a critical examination, as to doctrine, but so far as we see it is full, clear, pointed, practical, sound.

It enables the student to make the most thorough investigation and preparation upon every subject discussed, as it contains references to the principal treatises extant upon them. It is a great advantage to have all this vast and varied fund of information bound up together in such a neat form.

We take pleasure in commending this volume to our readers. Address W. A. Wilde & Co., No. 25 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

Conscience in Work.

Natural and acquired ability—that is talents and skill—are valuable possessions for any young man. They enable him to be more or less independent as to the kind of work the may do and the amount of remuneration he may receive. This is so because his services are in demand by those who want good and quick work done. But there is something even more valuable than talents and skill. It is conscience. Some do an amount of work which they consider an equivalent for the salary they receive; others do as little work as possible, only being sure they do enough to retain their positions. One of these classes is the strictly just: the other is dishonest, and between the two are many degrees. Outside these classes is the workman who looks beyond immediate financia gain, who never asks himself, "Am I earning more than I get?" but who gives his best effort to the man who buys his time and labor; for every employer undoubtedly desires that his employes do their best, whether his experience gives grounds for hope in the direction or not.

Skill possessed is not necessarily skill used; talents may be the endowment of lazy men. Conscience is the good that should stir up the skillful or talented man who refuses or neglects to use his ability. Conscience should give zest to one's work; it should look out for quality and quantity without thought of immediate financial gain. In other words, a young workman, a clerk, a bookpeeper, should do his work for its own sake and for the sake of using to the fullest the gifts that come from above.

This is not saying that any one should not ask for and expect good pay for good work, but the idea is that when a young man accepts a position he should do his best irrespective of the amount of salary he receives.

The skilled but indolent workman should not think that because he possesses skill his employer can not get along without him. Conscience in work leads to skill, and he who does his best under all circumstances has a better chance for reaching the top of the ladder than the possessor of ability who refuses to use it. But conscience is not to be easily satisfied if the highest excellence is to be attained. Rigid and constant self-inspection is necessary that no leaks occur, in the time reservoir—the day's labor. The habit of never wasting time is a most valuable acquirement; conscience in labor may form this habit.

But all this talk is about that labor which is paid for in dollars and cents. Is conscience easily satisfied in regard to religious work done? Are small duties neglected in the belief that "it wont be noticed?" "Thou God seest me." The best thought and most earnest physical endeavor are not too good for the Lord we serve. If high salary results from conscientious effort here, how much greater is the reward that we are promised will follow the divine, "Well done!"—Selected.

Putting on Christ.

[Rev. Charles H. Spurgeon.]

No man's example will precisely fit his fellow man; but there is this strange virtue about the character of Christ, that you may all imitate it and yet be none of you mere imitators. He is perfectly natural who is perfectly like Christ. There need be no affectation, no painful restraint, no straining. So wonderful is Jesus, the second Adam of the new born race, that each member of that family may bear a likeness to him and yet exhibit a clear individuality. A man advanced in years and wisdom may put Him on, and so may the least instructed and the freshest comer among us. Please remember this: we may not choose examples, but each one is bound to copy the Lord Jesus Christ. You have a special personality; you are such a person that there is not another exactly like you, and you are placed in circumstances so peculiar that no one else is tried exactly as you are—to you, then, this exhortation is sent: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." It is absolutely certain that for you, with your personal singularity and peculiar circumstances, there can be nothing better than that you array yourself in this more than royal robe. You, too, who live in ordinary circumstances and are only tried by common temptations, you are to "put on the Lord Jesus Christ," for he will be suitable for you also. "O," cries one, "but the Lord Jesus never was exactly where I am!" You say this from want of knowing better or from want of thought. He has been tempted in all points, like as you are. There are certain relationships which the Lord Jesus could not literally occupy, but, then, he took their spiritual counterpart. For instance, Jesus could not be a husband after the flesh. Does anyone demand how he could be an example for husbands? Hearken! "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church and gave himself for it." He is a model in a relationship which, naturally, he never sustained, but which in every deed he has more than fulfilled. Wherever you may be you will find that the Lord Jesus has occupied the counterpart of your position, or else the position is sinful and ought to be quitted. In any place, at any hour, in any circumstances, in any matter, you may put on the Lord Jesus Christ and never fear that your array will be unsuitable.

Be Generous While Alive.

I have felt that it is a great mistake to put off being generous till after you are dead. In the first place you lose the pleasure of witnessing the good that you may do; and, again, no one can administer your gifts for you as you can do it yourself. It is a great pleasure to be brought into personal relations of that kind, and to make people feel that you are not a philanthropist in the abstract, but that you are interested in them personally and care for their welfare. In that way you benefit them not merely in a natural way, but you make them feel that men are really brothers, and that they were made to help one another. That feeling is not only agreeable in itself, but it will be apt to prompt them to carry out the principle themselves. Put yourself into all you do, and let others feel that you are there. Do not only contribute to a charitable fund, but go yourself and help. It may seem an inconvenience at first, but soon you will come to consider it worth any inconvenience.—G. W. Childs.

Zechariah III. 1-10.

JOSHUA THE HIGH PRIEST.

By Rev. J. Q. A. Curry.

CONNECTING LINKS.

Zechariah was the greatest of the dozen or more of the same name in Jewish history. He was contemporary with Haggai and Malachi, and came to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel and Joshua when quite young. He was a priest as well as prophet and was one of the heads of the twelve courses, and grandson of the famous Iddo. He prophesied at the same time with Haggai, or rather followed the latter, supplementing his work. Haggai and Zechariah were the Peter and Paul of the return from captivity. Haggai with his earnest practical messages prepared the way for the more philosophical and prophetical utterances of Zechariah. Zechariah began his prophecy in November, B. C. 520, about one month later than our last lesson. He deals with questions of the past, present and future in eight visions. Our lesson to-day is embraced in the fourth vision.

I. JOSHUA ACCUSED.

"HE"—The angel who had already revealed and interpreted several visions to Zechariah. "JOSHUA * * * STANDING BEFORE THE ANGEL OF THE LORD."

As high priest Joshua stood before the altar which had been built, as the representative of the people, offering sacrifices for their sins and making intercession for them. At the same time he stands before Jehovah, who searches the very depth of his soul. Joshua's morals may stand the scrutinizing gaze of the people, but his very thoughts and motives are closely observed by the Lord. It is well for us, if we can be made to realize keenly that while our lives are exposed to worldly criticism or compliment, that we also stand before the Lord, to whom we must render account. We may also learn that the sacredness and exalted character of our office will not relieve us from the assaults of Satan. Neither may the faithful discharge of our duty, though it lessens the probability of fallings, be considered an absolute safeguard against temptation. For here we behold "SATAN STANDING AT HIS RIGHT HAND TO RESIST HIM."

"When the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, Satan came also among them." Job i. 6. This is where he is needed most. Ordinary agencies may accomplish his designs elsewhere. But he is here as an "accuser" of the high priest. He now seems to be greatly concerned about the righteousness of Joshua, and has the audacity to bring his case before the Lord. But then, he even presumed to tempt our Savior and we cannot expect to evade his attacks.

Quite a literal application of this vision can be found in the person of Sanballat (Neh. ii. 10), who bitterly opposed the Jews in their work. "THE LORD REBUKE THEE, O SATAN." The Lord is our defence. If the question had been the merit or demerit of Jerusalem, condemnation would have resulted. If the just deserts of our sins were awarded us we would be lost. But it is God's "choice" that Jerusalem shall be restored, and likewise that the sinner shall be saved. Our cases are not decided on the merits of our case, but on the MERITS OF CHRIST. Jehovah had saved Jerusalem as "A BRAND PLUCKED OUT OF THE FIRE" and He therefore administered to Satan a well deserved rebuke for his impudence.

II. JOSHUA ACQUITTED.

While the trial was in progress "JOSHUA WAS CLOTHED WITH FILTHY GARMENTS," typical of the guilt of which he was accused. "TAKE AWAY THE FILTHY GARMENTS FROM HIM." On a certain occasion when Luther was sick, Satan seemed to come to him with a great roll containing all the sins of his life and argued that his eternal doom was certain. "Yes," said Luther, "that list is all true and correct, but you have forgotten one thing. 'The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin.'" Satan vanished. "I WILL CLOTHE THEE WITH A CHANGE OF RAIMENT." The robe of Christ's righteousness is thrown around all those that believe in Him. "SO THEY SET A FAIR MITRE UPON HIS HEAD." Thus he is confirmed in his office as high priest. His innocence and integrity have been confirmed by a higher than an earthly court. The sweet consciousness of divine approval is his portion.

The Jews have been accused of treason and rebellion by their enemies at the court of Darius, with some show of their discomfiture, but this prophetic vision sees the final failure of these designs and the certain restoration of Jerusalem in her beauty and power.

III. JOSHUA ADMONISHED.

Pardon always incurs the debt of future obedience and faithfulness. The restoration of Jerusalem is a failure if it does not result in increased faithfulness. "IF THOU WILT WALK IN MY WAYS, AND.....KEEP MY CHARGE.....AND SHALL KEEP MY COURTS." Much had been lost in the past by their failing to observe these principles. And the Angel reminds Joshua of these duties. Besides assuring him of success in his official labors, which is always a cause of deep gratitude to the faithful servant of God, he declares "I WILL GIVE THEE PLACES TO WALK AMONG THESE THAT STAND BY" Joshua is promised a place among God's holy angels when he shall have faithfully performed his earthly mission. The outlook of the Christian is a cheering one.

IV. JOSHUA ADVISED.

From the stern realities of the present and immediate future the high priest is permitted to cast his eyes down the unborn centuries to behold "THE BRANCH." This no doubt refers to Christ the Savior, of whom Joshua is a type. The people are discouraged in building the temple as though it were the work of man. But Jehovah declares that it is "THE STONE I HAVE LAID," and there need, therefore, be no fear as to the result. "UPON THE STONE SHALL BE SEVEN EYES." Seven is the number of perfection and typifies the omniscience of God. God's eye is upon the work, and it will not fail. Yea, the angels and the saints, and patriarchs and prophets have their eyes fixed upon that stone, which shall become the Head of the corner. "I WILL REMOVE THE INIQUITY OF THE LAND IN ONE DAY." When the BRANCH shall come forth, He shall in "one day" secure the redemption of the race. "IN THAT DAY, SAITH THE LORD OF HOSTS, SHALL YE CALL EVERY MAN HIS NEIGHBOR UNDER THE VINE AND UNDER THE FIG TREE."

Giving to the Poor is Lending to the Lord.

"He that giveth to the poor shall not lack" (Prov. 28:27). Instead of trying so hard to put money in the bank, would it not be better and safer to give more to relieve those in want? If the Bible teaches anything with clearness, it teaches that the way we treat the poor is the test of our loyalty to Christ. To neglect them means that we are not true to him. Whenever we have a chance to help the poor it is an opportunity God gives us to show that we are true to Him. "He that giveth to the poor shall not lack." Ye that are looking for safe investments, can you find anything more secure than this? No such certainty to be found in gold and diamonds as that. Diamonds will burn and gold will melt, but God's word will stand when the rocks and mountains are gone.—Selected.

That Boy.

"His name is not Solomon. There are many things he does not know. Remember that he is only a boy. You were once. Call to mind what you thought, and how you felt. Give that boy a chance. Keep near to him in sympathy. Be his chum. Do not make too many cast-iron laws. Rule with a velvet hand. Help him have a "good time." Answer his foolish questions. Be patient with his pranks. Laugh at his jokes. Sweat over his conundrums. Limber up your dignity with a game of base ball or a holiday's fishing. You can win his heart utterly and hold him steady in the path that leads higher up. That boy has a soul, and a destiny reaching high above the mountain peak. He is worth a million times his weight in gold."

Home Life.

The secret of many failures and defalcations may be found in the home life. One has said the home life is the basis of all life, and a happy home is essential to safety and success in any department of life. Occasionally a man or woman is strong enough and sufficiently self contained to endure disquiet and unhappiness at home without flinching at any point of duty. But the majority are not so. They become discouraged, lose heart, and, at last, break down. Many of the sudden and surprising lapses are to be traced to this cause. Indeed, when one finds himself tied for life to a home, and has become convinced that there is no rest or happiness for him in it, it is not surprising that he becomes discouraged and breaks down. This is the natural result, however much we may deplore it. And it is no more true of the man than it is of the woman.

On the other hand, a man is prepared to stand almost any hardship or suffering which may fall to his lot in the world, if he only has a good home, full of sympathy and love, in which he may retreat. Therein he grows strong, in it he has something for which to endure and fight. Many a man's success, many a woman's triumph, are to be attributed to the happy homes in which they live. There is no other place so much like heaven, this side of heaven, as a happy home.

What are the Returns?

Will it pay?—is a fair question to ask the promoter of any enterprise requiring the investment of money. This query is as applicable to solicitations for benevolent objects as it is to business ventures involving promised dividends in commercial transactions. Does the investment of money in saloons and attendant iniquities yield returns in moral degradation and increase in vice? Does money which is made to multiply honorable business enterprises result in developing character and nobleness of life? As certainly as that some kinds of business degrade and others uplift men, so certainly must men take these results into account when making up the balance sheet which will show the debits and credits of life. This important question is not how many thousands or millions of dollars men leave when they die, but how much of glory to God stands to their credit on the books of the recording angel. The amount of such heavenly credit is often strangely at variance with the financial rating in the commercial agencies of the world. The dividends in the widow's mite will enrich the poor woman with eternal and heavenly treasures, while the selfishly accumulated and selfishly used millions of the "rich fool" will pauperize his soul through all eternity.—Young Men's Era.

Field Notes.

BOZEMAN.

I have been in a meeting for three weeks. There is a growing interest in the work. The most of the preaching has been done by Bros. Alton, Squires, Warren and Shaeffer. These are all workmen that need not be ashamed, and I am under lasting obligations to them for their assistance. Three have joined the church, and 25 or more have expressed their desire to be religious; but we find it difficult here, as it is every where in this country, to get men to make a complete surrender to Christ. I have a young man in my home now, who feels that he is called to the ministry, and is preparing to enter into the work at once. He is not yet 20 years of age. He is good material, and if given a chance will make a useful man. With kind regards for the editor, and sincere prayers for the success of our paper, I am as ever,

S. B. Tabor.

WILLOW CREEK.

W. T. Goulder: Our new house is nearing completion, and then we will be comfortable. I am determined that as long as I am a Methodist preacher I will use my utmost endeavor to have a good house for the one who comes after me. I have no reason to be discouraged with my work. The outlook is good, and I meet with encouragement all around my large circuit. My preaching is simple and plain. I try to please the good Lord. The people come to hear it, and seem pleased also. At three of my appointments they want me to come twice a month. At two of these places I believe they would pay half my estimated salary if I would thus give them two Sundays a month. But what am I to do? So many places, and so many people hungry for the gospel.

HELENA.

It was our privilege to worship with the congregation at this place on the first day of the new year. The Sunday-school was fairly well attended, and consists of a brave and determined band. There was a good congregation and the people were very attentive while we endeavored to preach to them the words of this life. We had the pleasure of listening to a strong sermon by the pastor at night. Our readers will find a synopsis of it on another page in this paper. Brother Shaeffer is well received by the people and is doing a good work. He greatly needs a new church. This would give our cause a fresh impetus at the capital city. We trust that the way will open soon for our people who "dwell in ceiled houses" to see their way clear to rally and build a better house for the Lord.

THE STATE TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

A notable event in the history of western Montana was the assembling of the State Teachers' Association in its annual meeting at Missoula, on Tuesday, December 2, 1892. There were 205 teachers' besides others officially connected with education in the state, present. It was the largest and most enthusiastic gathering of the kind ever held in Montana. It was composed of representatives of the college and university, as well as of the public school. Prof. E. O. Steere, state superintendent of puplic instruction, presided, with Miss Riley, of Butte, Secretary and Prof. W. M. Weeks, of Miles City, Treasurer.

Fully eighty per cent. of the teachers are ladies, and a large proportion of the country superintendents are also ladies, which shows the generosity of the male portion of the population, who are engaged in sterner pursuits, in turning over the work of educating the rising generation to the gentler sex. There was a fine exhibit of the work done in the schools throughout the state. It would do credit to our state, and will make a fine showing at the World's Fair, where a portion of it will be on exhibition.

An extensive and appropriate program had been prepared, and some excellent papers were read, which not unfrequently provoked spirited debate. The discussions, generally, were of a high order, and took a wider range than had been common at such gatherings. Prof. W. M. Weeks produced a paper on "Moral Education in the Public Schools;" J. C. Mahoney, one on "Patriotism in the Public Schools. J. A. Riley, of Butte, talked on the "Kindergarten with relation to the Public School," while Prof. Frazer of the University of Montana, made a choice contribution on the "Claims of the Classics," which excited much favorable comment. Other excellent papers were read and the subjects ably discussed. Profs. Reid of Deer Lodge, Stone, of Anaconda, Templeton, of Helena, Weeks, of Miles City, Riley, of Butte, and Young and Frazer of Helena, seemed to be the leading spirits in the convention. Mrs. Cummins, of Helena, also is a pleasing and impressive speaker.

The sesions were held in the rooms of the Hotel Missoula, while the majority of the guests were entertained at the Florence Hotel. Miss Horde, the superintendent of Missoula county, Prof. Hamilton and the local teachers, together with the good people of Missoula, did all in their power to make the occasion the great success that it was. Prof. Hamilton was elected president for the ensuing year, Miss Riley, Secretary, and W. M. Weeks, Treasurer.

The educational council recommended legislation looking to the enforcement of the compulsory education clauses and recommending that all the departments of the state university should be located at one place, instead of scattering them over the country just to gratify the whims of rival towns.

The Board of Trade honored the Association wth a grand banquet on Friday night, which was the most brilliant affair of the kind that we have ever attended in Montana. There was no dancing! Four tables laden with the rarest delicacies of the season in great abundance, extended lengthwise across the commodious hall, at which were seated nearly 250 people, representing the beauty, the culture and chivalry of our far mountain land. It was a lovely company. The repast which would have done honor to the representatives of royalty, was followed by a "feast of reason and a flow of soul." Our old friend, Judge Knowles, was toast master, and was most felicitous in his intrroductory remarks. The toasts were selected with taste, and the responses were, for the most part, wity and wise, holding the company spell-bound for two full hours. It was a brilliant affair, and an occasion long to be remembered. The next annual session will be held at Butte City.

EDUCATIONAL ECHOES.

The town of Missoula makes no secret of her candidacy for the seat of the state university. If she treats and impresses the locating commissioners, or who ever may have the power to decide the matter, as she did the Teachers' Association, she will surely make a strong race. The hosts of members in attendance from a distance were loud in their praises of the beauty and generous hospitality of the "Garden City."

We think that no one present at the Teachers' Association appreciated the progress in the work of education in Montana within the last twenty years more than the present writer. When we came here there were scarcely more than half a dozen school houses in the Territory, and they—even those in Helena, Bozeman and Virginia City, were of the plainest sort. We taught one term of school in a vacant cabin built of round logs, covered with dirt, the roof so low that we could not stand erect except in the centre of the building, an the cracks of ample side and number to prevent the necessity of any other means of ventilation; while another term was conducted successfully for three months in an ex-blacksmith shop. We acted as superintendent in Meagher county during our residence there in '74, when there were six school districts in all that vast area of country. To step from that position into an assembly of 200 teachers, and that not a quarter of those engaged in teaching the young ideas of our young Montanians how to shoot, and possessed of such grace and culture is enough to awaken most pleasing emotions. We rejoice that we have contributed anything, though but the smallest mite, to the progress of this great cause of education in our great state.

We are in deep sympathy with those who are teaching the children and youth of our country. Their work, in giving type to the habits and character of the rising generation, is closely allied to that of the parent. In fact, it not unfrequently occurs that the school teacher makes the last and most striking and enduring impression upon the mental and moral, as well as the physical, natures of those under their care. How responsible, as well as difficult and trying, their task. What manner of persons ought they to be in life and conversation. Let us cooperate with and encourage those who possess the spirit and practice the principles of the great Master, who "taught as one having authority"—the only perfect Model the world has ever beheld.

The educational association is to the common school teacher what the annual conference or convention is to the itinerant preacher or other Christian workers. Many of them are in frontier communities, where they "board around," where accommodations are not the best, and were they have but little sympathy in their work. What a relief to lay aside the cares of the school-room and meet with scores of congenial spirits, and enjoy contact of ideas which refreshes and inspires and strengthens for future tasks. Two ladies told us that they taught in communities where none of the people spoke English. They appeared perfectly happy to meet again with those who speak their own tongue and are engaged in the lame work. A fellow-feeling makes us all akin.

While we take delight in seeing young people happy and joyous, yet we cannot prevent a feeling of regret at seeing so many of those whom we receive into our homes as models of intellectual and moral culture and whose spirit and life and example enters so largely into the character and life of those whom we are training for eternity, engage in the foolish dance which has deluded so many into a life of impurity; and also in playing at cards when many a promising boy, the pride and joy and hope of a fond mother's heart, has received his first lesson that prepared him for the gaming table, the gambling house, and finally for all the horrors of the gambler's hell.

We would not encourage the teaching of sectarian tenets in the public school, yet we would especially deplore any tendency upon the part of the educators of our youth to discourage the study and practice of the principles and precepts of the great Teacher. We rejoice that so many of the leading educators of Montana are Christian men and women, and it afforded us inexpressible pleasure to hear that great company of teachers in closing their session, join in singing with such hearty good will, "God be with you till we meet again." With Christian mothers in our homes and Godly teachers in our schools the prosperity and perpetuity of our country is assured.

When we first entered the Association hall and witnessed the grace and good nature, the ease and elegance, the parliamentary precision displayed and the harmony that for the most part prevailed, we thought what a privilege to be surrounded by such culture, and to see it so perfectly portrayed in parliamentary performances. What a glorious thing was education. How it facilitates the transaction of business. In simplicity and serenity we sat and tried to absorb the spirit of our solons. But in the afternoon, when it came to the election of officers and there arose a discussion both as to the candidates and also about the meaning of the constitution as to who could vote, the scene changed, and for a while we never saw confusion worse confounded. It required Weeks (W. M.) to bring order out of the parliamentary chaos, and to Steere clear of the Riley waters. After all we felt some comfort in finding out that illiterate itinerants are not the only ones who sometimes get things in a muddle.

We are pleased to see the professors of our college associated with the teachers of the public schools in these annual gatherings. It will be well for all departments if this state of things continue.

Music, both vocal and instrumental, was a prominent feature during the session of the Teachers' Association. The audiences were almost wild with delight over the performances on the violin of Prof. Howard, the teacher of music in the public schools of Butte. Perfect stillness prevailed as the soft and soothing strains rolled forth from an instrument of strings. He was encored on every occasion when called out. It is well that music is becoming an important feature in our schools. We used it as oil with which to allay the rising tide of troubled waters many a time when we were a pedagogue, and always with good success.

We are not clannish, but we could not help observing the fact that a number of the prominent members of the association hailed from the state of Missouri, which speaks in no mean terms for the credit of that much abused portion of this earthly ball.

FROM McMINNVILLE, TENN.

A. C. COUEY.

Montana Methodist:—It seems only a few weeks since I wrote you from Murfreesboro, during the interim of the Montana and the Tennessee Conferences—while in fact these weeks have lengthened into months--and it is now in the midst of the holidays.

The readers of the Methodist, who knew us in Montana, have for some time known that by the rightful authority, over the Tennessee Conference, we were sent to McMinnville, Tenn., for the next conference year.

This little city nestles in a crescent range of the Cumberland Mountains, and is about five hundred feet higher than Nashville.

I is a manfacturing town, and has other support from agricultural and coal mining, etc. In the point of climate and scenic effect, we have something like we have been accustomed to in Montana during the past six years.

Bishop Galloway seemed to have studied the fitness of things in the above respects, so that we are let down gradually. We are delighted with this aspect of our home in the South. We shall still breathe the cool mountain air.

It is our happy fortune to find a hadsome new church clear of debt, and a splendid seven-room parsonage, besides bath-room, comfortably furnished, largely in answer to the idea anticipated in the Discipline.

Our membership of two hundred and fifty, with the outside attendance, gives us a very nice congregation of hearers every Sunday. The Sunday-school is an inspiration to us every Sabbath. It is a great spur to a pastor to address a full board of nine stewards every Sunday.

Brethren of the far west, and you especially of the Montana Conference, I pen these lines, with this purpose in view, viz: to contrast the feeling in a pastor's breast here and where you labor, and where I have labored. Here, I enter into the history which some other men have made—you are making a history of your own. Really down in my heart, I enjoyed work like you are doing, and I urge you to rejoice in your labor of laying the foundation and building. It is a noble work, and should be a daily inspiration to you.

The people here are very appreciative and also very kind. We are well taken care of, and thus are brought under great obligations in duty.

Knowing the need of missionary help in "front" we are pressing the cause of missions in our charge. We have inaugurated special work here on "the debt" and purpose doing our part to send you help for "sinews of war."

Mrs. Couey was in quite a prostrated condition this summer when we came to Tennessee, from nervousness, but since getting settled in our new charge we have been able to secure to her almost absolute rest from household and church work. She is improving nicely, and is gaining flesh, and begins to look like her former self. She takes a Sunday-school class, to begin with the first Sunday in January. We write these lines for the eye of her special friends in Montana.

I am glad Bro. Stanley, that you have noticed the mistake into which the printers have led us, in causing me to say things that I did not say.

We hail with joy the possibilities of the "Methodist" becoming a weekly, though to date we have not seen a copy.

—o—

A Queer Enquirer.

I was assisting a Methodist brother in a meeting of several weeks' duration, in Northern Michigan. Among the inquirers was a young man of good connections, but dissipated. The pastor turned him over to me, and we entered into conversation freely. He said he was ready to unite with the church when they would accept him on certain conditions, viz: he was not to be asked to give up dancing and card playing.

Knowing his history well, I asked him the following questions, to which he gave the answers as indicated:

"You confessed in the meeting that you had the tobacco habit to a filthy degree. Where did you learn to use it?"

"I learned it in the opera house."

"You said you had the disgusting habit of drinking. Where did you learn that?"

"I learned it in the opera house."

"You acknowledged that you had squandered a good home in gambling. Where did you take lessons in that art?"

"Right there in that opera house."

"Where did you begin the life of impurity which you referred to tonight?"

"In the opera house."

"Wherewith did you learn to gamble?"

"With cards, of course."

"Where did you learn to play cards?"

"In the opera house."

"Please tell me what took you to the opera house so much?"

"Attending ten cent dances and balls."

Said I, "My dear friend: How can you ask any church to accept you under such conditions as these, when, according to your own confession, these habits have been the cause of all your trouble? I tell you, candidly, I can see no hope for you, unless you give up these godless amusements and accept Christ."—Christian Herald.

PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

From time within the memory of man, it has been the custom of some to yearn for OLD-FASHIONED RELIGION. We chance to read the columns of a religious paper of fifty or a hundred years ago, and it would seem as though Christianity at that time was rapidly on the down grade. These good people are never satisfied with the present, but seem constantly to think that things ought to be better While thus complaining they are, as a rule, the least active in bringing about that which "ought to be."

It is difficult to understand how people arrive at such strange conclusions, unless it be, that they are not as familiar with the history of Christianity as they should be. It may be admitted consistently, that no one line of Christian work stands out as prominently as it did in the centuries past, owing to the multiplicity of avenues for Christian activity that have been opened during this cencentury. Modern Christianity no longer cleaves to a few hobbies and holds them out to the world as the criterion of a Christian character, but is making its influence felt among all classes of mankind and its spirit is directing the minds of men in every vocation of life.

To-day the BEST and ABLEST men in our and other lands are firm believers in the old Bible truth, "Godliness is profitable unto all things." Governments are no longer indifferent to the appeals of Christianity, but are compelled to heed its precepts and principles. The true Christian spirit of the nineteenth century does not hurl its missiles at EFFECTS of sin, but aims its blows directly at the CAUSES of sin—the source of all evil. It does not condemn the man only who "puts the cup to his neighbor's lips," but holds responsible him also who gives said man the RIGHT to do so. It teaches that the man who votes for the perpetuation of the liquor traffic is, in a large measure, responsible for the drunkenness of his son, the pollution of his daughter and the ruined sanctity of his home.

While the average Christian nowa-days does not relish a two hour sermon as some may have in days of yore, he rather believes, that a true follower of Jesus Christ is not so much to HEAR the Scriptures as he is to SEARCH them and live as they direct. He believes that the command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," was not intended for a few preachers only, but that it is the duty of every Christian to present the Gospel to others and try to win them for the Kingdom of Heaven.

Along the line of Benevolence and Charity marked progress has been made. The interest that has been awakened in missionary enterprises within the last half century is marvelous. Home missions are pushed with a zeal and energy before unknown. Millions of dollars are expended annually for Foreign Missions, and hundreds of noble, consecrated disciples of Christ have gone to benighted heathen lands to preach the "blessed Gospel of Love" to their ignorant brethren. Surely, a religion that constrains men and women to leave pleasant homes and bright prospects, to cross the waters to unknown lands, to face savage mobs and a death-threatening climate, cannot be losing its power to save souls and redeem mankind.

Nearly all of our institutions of learning have been founded by Christian men. These schools have been increasing in number and efficiency until now, we have the best educational advantages ever known. Christians whom God has prospered, have liberally endowed many of these institutions and have thus made it possible for any true seeker of knowledge to acquire an education, and especial advantages are open to those who wish to prepare for Christian work. Institutions for the helpless and unfortunate are numerous. The poor have places of refuge, the insane their asylums, the blind and mute their special schools, the invalid their hospitals and the aged their homes. These institutions are supported directly or indirectly by God-fearing people. Christian benevolence is on the onward march. Go where you may, and you will find the Gospel of Christ influencing hearts and minds as never before.

Another visible sign of the Progress of Christianity is to be seen in the rapidly increasing number of adherents. These people who are fond of complaining tell us that there is so much worldliness in the church today—so many hypocrites. What of that? There are now many times the number of professing Christians there were a few centuries ago, and it is only reasonable to suppose that a greater number of hypocrites—counterfeit Christians—can be found. There were a few hyocrites, and false propets as early as the Apostolic age. The ratio has certainly been diminished.

Note the staunch army of business men marching Zion-ward, quite fifty to one against the early part of this century. Religious business men are becoming the leaders in commerce and manufacture the world over. Their liberal donations for benevolent purposes would have appalled our ancestors of a few generations back. The professions, too, are being blessed with the hallowed influence of Christians who engage in them. Modern Christianity does not consider a lawyer beyond redemption, or a tax collector necessarily a sinner.

Among students in our colleges and universities the same progress is noticeable. At the beginning of this century Yale had but one Christian among 275 students, the majority were atheists or infidels. In other schools the religious temperature was almost as low. A decided change has taken place. In 1880, a careful estimate showed that 35 per cent. of the students in these institutions were professors of religion. In 1890, an estimate, equally as careful, showed that fully 50 per cent. were on the Lord's side, enlisted in the Army of the King, many of whom are among the most efficient and consecrated members of our churches.

Certainly there are things that MIGHT be better, and WILL be better. God works slowly and thoroughly. "His ways are not our ways." He said that His Kingdom shall triumph over all, and it will. His promises are true, and his plans immutable. Let every Christian be of good cheer Do not worry over the present, but earnestly strive to make it better. Hope, trust, pray! Christis leading on to victory. O.

The Confidence of Faith.

"Why art thou cast down O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise Him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God." (Psalms 42: 11). "Hope thou in God," should always be the watchword of every Christian heart. It is the attitude of trust and constant expectancy. It is what we can do when we can't do anything else. It is sitting down quietly to watch for the dawn when there is not a star in sight. It is the expectation of a good breakfast when there is nothing in the house at night. It is the belief that in some way God will surely provide, when we have nothing left in bank. We have the warrant of God's word to hope in Him when we have nothing to base a hope anywhere else. "For I shall yet praise Him," is always the song of the soul that has no doubt. God has never disappointed faith, and never will. He may sometimes keep it waiting, but it is only that He may give it more than it asks.—Ram's Horn.

The Soul a Picture Gallery.

Your souls are a picture gallery. Cover the walls of them with things serene, noble, beautiful, and the foul and fleshy will only seem revolting.

"Hang this upon the walls of your room," said a wise picture dealer to an Oxford under-graduate, as he handed to him the engraving of a Madonna of Raphael, "and then all the pictures of jockeys and ballet girls will disappear.

Try the same experiment with your soul. Let their walls be hung with all things sweet and perfect—the thought of God, the image of Christ, the lives of God's saints, the aspiration of good and great men, the memories of golden deeds, noble passages of poetic thought, scenes of mountains, and sunset, and ocean.

Oh, do this, and there shall be no room for the the thought of carnal ugliness, which deprave corrupted souls!—Farrar's Sermons.

NEEDED LEGISLATION.

Governor Richard's message, most of which we heard him read to the legislature assembled in joint session, is an able document, and reveals a thoughtful and intelligent interest in the welfare of our state. But in the wide range of subjects named as needing legislation we failed to note any suggestions concerning Sunday law, the prevention of gambling, or the suppression of the brutal practice of prize-fighting, which is becoming far too common in our country.

Surely the time has come in the history of our commonwealth when something should be done towards recgonizing in our legal code a higher standard of morals, or when the higher moral sense of our progressive population should find expression in statutory form. The time past "sufficeth to have wrought the will of the Gentiles" The old regime may have served for prospectors, adventurers and cosmopolitan communities, but it is now demonstrated that this is a fit country for habitation. Our homes, our wives, our children are here, and we should see that in point of purity and refinement and high moral standards, it should be equal to any portion of our common country.

We would be far from trying to make men religious by legislation or far from trying to compel the religious obs-ervance of Sunday. But we may and do hope for the good of the state, for the good of man and beast, for the good of humanity at large to see one day in seven recognized and set apart as a day of rest from ordinary toil. The Sabbath is not a Jewish institution, but as old as the world. The law requiring its observance is found in the needs of human nature. Man cannot endure the friction of constant toil. The complicated machinery becomes overheated anp suffers great perversion, if it is not utterly wrecked. The commonest engine is not expected to run all the time. It must be allowed time for cleansing, oiling and cooling occasionally.

We are living too fast, trying to do too much. Better go slower, do better work and last longer, besides being better fitted for work in the next department. Better lose a little time if necessary, while the furnaces are firing up and the freight trains are getting under headway on Monday morning, than let our working men live and die in the heat and dust of dungeons, made so by Sunday work, with no spiritual instruction or scarcely a thought of a higher or better life.

We have felt pained at the examples of Sabbath desecration set by capitalists and leading men in communities where the majority of the people had tried to observe the law as old as our nation—as old as the world. We believe in material devopement and for more than twenty-one years have contributed our share toward it here in Montana, but unless it is properly directed and conserved by moral forces it will early prove a curse and produce a crash. It is high time to call a halt.

Only a short time ago a gentle man called upon us to know what could be done to check the growth of the gambling vice. One of his sons was being ruined and he feared another would be. If every voter and every legislator in Montana had only the same experience as that father, they would soon have a law to put greater restraints upon this fearful evil. Is it not our duty to act just as if we were in his place?

Then it is a shame for men to be permitted to perpetrate the brutal practise of the prize fight before the public gaze. Let our law makers put such an odium upon it as will drive it from our fair land forever.

Let our legislators take these matters under careful advisement and enact laws that will be a credit to our commonwealth for all time to come. They will be as conductive to the general prosperity of our country, by the class of people that they will encourage to seek homes in our midst, as many other measures that are now enlisting general attention.

DEATH OF REV. M. O. LIGON.

Corvallis, Or., Dec. 25.—The remains of the late M. O. Ligon, who died Friday night from the injuries sustained a few days previous by the falling of an awning, have been expressed to Anderson, S. C., where his parents reside. Rev. Ligon has been pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, during the past year, and was well and favorably known. Memorial services were held this afternoon in his honor, conducted by Rev. E. J. Thompson and were largely attended.

We were shocked above measure when we read the above dispatch which was clipped from an Oregon paper, and sent us by Brother Baxter in a letter. We wept as for a brother beloved. Only a few short months ago we made the acquaintance of Brother Ligon at the Columbia conference at Albany. With his tall, graceful form, his intelligent, benignant manly face, his modest and pleasing manner, to know him was to love him. We were strangely drawn to him from the first and could not help thinking what a bright future was before him, and what power he would be in elevating the tone and insuring the success of our Methodism in the Northwest. We were utterly unprepared for such message. How hard to realize that we shall see our brother no more on earth. How early and unexpectedly his labors have come to an end. But a week or two ago we were rejoicing over the gift of the noble South Carolina Methodists to the Northwest. Little did we dream that so soon our tears were to mingle with theirs for the untimely departure of one of her noblest sons. We sorrow, it would be unnatural not to do so, but, thank God, not as those who have no hope. We shall meet our brother again on the other shore.

The following note from Rev. B. R. Baxter contains all the particulars that we have received at this writing.

"Dear Brother:—The enclosed slip in regard to Brother Ligon explains itself in part. A portion of a brick wall fell in connecti n with the awning. His skull was fractured, and one leg broken below the knee. So says another statement in another paper. He began his year's labor with good promise of success. He has no doubt entered into rest. I do not call it "a strange mysterious providence," but a natural result of carelessness on the part of the property owners in not removing the wet heavy snow from the awning. We can illy afford to lose him from our conference."

Brother Ligon was a young man, having entered the ministry in South Carolina about a year ago last fall, when he was transferred to the Columbia conference, and stationed at Corvallis, Ore. He was devoted to his work and greatly loved by his brethren.

The Lord buries his workmen, but carries forward his work. May someone be raised up to fill the place of our ascended brother.

LETTER FROM B.R. BAXTER.

Dear Brother:—You doubtless see the reports of the preachers in the Pacific Methodist Advocate. That is about all the information I have in reference to their movements.

I have thought of many things and persons since I saw you about which and whom I would like to make inquiry. Do you know anything about Capt. W. H. Rodgers and family, of Virginia City? They were old friends and neighbors of ours, and we would like very much to hear from them. Can you tell me of Jesse Taylor and family?

I congratulate you on the publication of the "Montana Methodist" weekly, but do not see how you can afford it without increasing the price. It is clean, spicy and bright, and deserves large success. Every family of Southern Methodists, with every friend of the church in Montana, ought to take it, with as many elsewhere as can be induced to do so. How people expect to be intelligent church membesr and be posted as to doctrine, government, usage and the various enterprises of the church without constant and careful reading of church literature is beyond my comprehension. It is my opinion that there are enough members and friends, and many in connection with Southern Methodism in the four conferences and the Montana conference to make the "Pacific Methodist Advocate" and the "Montana Methodist" an assured success, without a dollar from the publishing house at Nashville. May the Lord open the understanding, the hearts and purses of all our people in behalf of these important interests.

We have had in this valley fourteen inches of snow which is going off with rain. It fell a week ago. I returned yesterday from a trip 35 miles to marry a couple.

——o——

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The dispatches tells of the conviction of a fine newspaper man in Pennsylvania for issuing his sheet on Sunday, and that the action has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of that state. A leading Montana paper says, "We are glad to note the "Philadelphia Record's" Sunday issue despite the court's views."

This seems to us to be singular advice. If one is allowed to violate the law with impunity, another will take the same privilege, and if he may violate it in one case, he may do so with equal propriety in every other case, just as suits his peculiar views. It is easy to see where this leads. Better submit to law, even if it were unjust, until it can be repealed in the regular way, than to openly encourage anarchy. For our part, we believe our country would be better off, by far, if there were laws in ever state prohibiting the publication of Sunday newspapers. They cannot be issued without Sunday work, and their tendency is to undermine the divine law and destroy the sacredness of the Sabbath, if not to destroy the constitution altogether in the end.

——o——

In the lower house of the Montana legislature there are 26 Democrats, 25 Republicans and 3 Populists, who have been duly recognized and sworn in, besides one seat to be contested by Leach, a Republican, and Hamilton, a Democrat. Thus far the Populists have voted with the Democrats. If Hamilton is seated, this will give the Democrats a majority over all in the joint ballot for Senator.

The many friends of Rev. B. R. Baxter, who was one of the first preachers in Helena, will be pleased to hears from him, and to know the friendly interest he takes in the people of Montana. The "Montana Methodist" has made hundreds of hearts glad by revealing the whereabouts of old friends and renewing friendship between the old timers scattered throughout the West and Northwest. It has brought sadness also to some by telling of the departure of old comrades to that home from whence no traveler has returned. Brother Baxter would find things very different from what they were when he left Montana. Captain Rodgers died a few years ago in Missoula. He maintained a pure Christian character and the respect of all who knew him till the last, as did his wife, who is also gone. Their hotel was the home for ministers as long as they kept it. Jesse Taylor and wife have been dead for years, and the children of both families are living in various parts of the country.

Since Christmas day, to the present time, Jan. 9, we have had as fine weather in Montana as could be desired anywhere. The thermometer has been as high as 66 degrees above in Helena, while all the snow is gone on the valleys. We expect a change, however, before this is in type.

THE CRISTIAN'S FAITH.

Nothing can be more theologically grand or brilliantly triumphant than the language and the reasoning of Paul in the eight chapter of his Epistle to the Romans. The chapter opens with a conclusion derived from what the Apostle has already said. The conclusion is, that there is "now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit." All such person are absolutely pardoned and justified "through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." And in respect to them the Apostle declares that all things shall work together for their good. God has determined to save them. He has called them and justified them freely by his grace, and will glorify them. Having "spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all," he will with him also freely give us all things." Such being the promises furnished in the gospel by God's grace, "who," asks the exualtant apostle, "shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" He answers the question by saying that "it is God that justifieth. God himself being the justifier, who can be the condemner? Yes, who can reverse his decree of justification and make it void? Turrni g to Christ as gracious Mediator between God and man, he adds: "It is Christ that died, yea, that is risen again, who is ever at the rigthhand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." With such a Christ for our friend, helper and advocate, "who is he that condemneth," and who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Looking at the perils and distresses of this life, he declares that "in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us." Coming at last to the climax of joy and confidence, the apostle breaks forth in the following lofty strain:

"For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

God's love in Christ and God's purpose of salvation through Christd settled the whole question of salvation in the mind of this Christ ological theologian. If we want to have Paul's triumph and hope, we must think Paul's thoughts. We must understand "the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe," as Paul taught it in his Epistle to the Romans. This will enable us to understand how it is that the gospel of Christ is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." The Christian needs to have Paul's doctrine of salvation at the foundation of his character and also his hope and if he has this, he will dismiss his doubts and read is "title clear to mansions in the skies." The gospel as explained by him, makes a straight road to heaven and clears away all the difficulties in getting there. This gospel can be understood by sufficient study, and that ought to be deemed a royal privilege.—New York Independent.

A BIG DONATION.

The Rev. Jay Benson Hamilton has collected from the Minutes of the Northern Methodist Conferences the deficencies in ministers' salaries for the last forty years. It seems this body of culture and refined Christian gentlemen paid to a church of the Lord Jesus the sum of five millions of dollars for the privilege of saving the souls and bettering the lives of the citizens. This huge heap of money was subtracted not from bank accounts, but from the bread and butter of the toilers. To comment is needful.—Richmond Advocate. And yet we have heard men say that preachers were after the money that there is in the vocation. Such critics deserve the pity, if not the contempt of mankind.

——o——

SWINE VERSUS SENTIMENT.

It is the habit of some people who pride themselves on being strictly practical to decry sentiment, chiefly on the ground that it is not quoted in the market reports. They seem to think that a thing which cannot be bought and sold has no real value. High-minded folk take an altogether different view. Most of the graces that humanize and glorify character have an unpurchasable sentient at the root of the. The most thorough-going utilitarian in the world is a growling pig. He "goes in" for business strictly and solely, and despises all side issues. Give him a dozen ears of corn, and he will attend to them without distraction.—Christian Advocate.

——o——

A DESERVED TRIBUTE.

Dr. Lafferty, in a recent number of the "Richmond Christian Advocate," says our venerable veteran of Montana the following deserved tribute:

We do not err in putting in front as the first face in the Sketches of the General Conference the Rev. L. B. Stateler. In 1831 he joined the Conference in Louisville, and that year was transferred to the Missouri Conference. Think of Methodism in Missouri in 1831. He has since been a member of eight Conferences, yet never transferred. "How was that?" He always adhered to a new frontier Conference when formed. Hard frontier service for sixty years! During the war, hunted by "loyal saints and scoundrels, he preached from Kansas, via Colorado and Idaho to Montana. What vast distances and marches through a country where the Sioux showed more pity than the patriots! He left his home in Kansas a smoking ruin and carried the gospel to Indian, miner, emigrant in the mountains. The few horses and cows driven before him as he journeyed on the plains increased in numbers, and from the sales now and then he helped the missionaries, built parsonages and erected churches. Lately he sold his cattle and gave the $5,000 to the Church Extension Society. He now in age waits for the coming of Jesus. Such is the story of Stateler. Has the age of Christian heroes gone by?

Show me the man you honor. I know by that sympton better than any other what kind of a man you are yourself; for you show me what your ideal of manhood is, what kind of a man you long to be.—Carlyle.

Zechariah IV. 1-10.

THE SPIRIT OF THE LORD.

By Rev. J. Q. A. Curry.

PREFATORY REMARKS.

The vision of this lesson occurs in the year B. C. 519 at the same time as our last lesson, The object of the lesson is also the same as last lesson. However, the message of last lesson was intended to arouse the drooping spirit of Joshua the priest; while this lesson is directed to Zerubbabel the prince, with the intention of inspiring him with courage and enthusiasm in the rebuilding of the temple, the work on which had been abandoned for nearly 15 years. Joshua was encouraged to faithfully fulfill the functions of his office as high priest; Zerubbabel, as temporal ruler, is reminded of his duty in returning to the abandoned temple building which had never been raised above the foundations.

I. THE VISION.

There seems to have been an intermission, necessarily very brief, between this and the last vision; for the prophet says that "THE ANGEL THAT TALKED WITH ME CAME AGAIN." The angel returned another message fresh from the Throne. Zechariah seems to have fallen into a sort of stupor, hence he says the angel "WAKED ME, AS A MAN THAT IS WAKENED OUT OF HIS SLEEP." "Such is the condition of our mind, so far inferior to that in the holy angels, that their state may be called wakefulness, ours a sleep." What Zechariah saw in these visions smote him into the silence of amazement. His senses were overpowered that he should see nothing, save that wherein is the sum of wisdom. It is a blessed thing to be able to concentrate our thoughts upon the importance of our duty or privilege to the exclusion of all others. We are then in some sense, at least, prepared to listen to the leadings of the Spirit of God. "WHAT SEEST THOU?" Let the testimony of our senses be heard. Let our eyes be open to behold the wondrous things out of God's law. "I LOOKED, AND BEHOLD A CANDLESTICK OF GOLD." The candlestick was a very important piece of furniture of the tabernacle and the finished temple. It was made of pure gold and had seven places for light branching out of the one stalk. Seven was a symbolic number and indicated perfection or completeness. Dr. Whedon thus beautifully explains the significance of this mystical number. "THREE is emphatically a divine number. All the great primary religions of the world, from the eastern verge of China to the western shore of Ireland, nay, including the continent of America, are more or less clearly trinitarian, the triangle is universally symbolical of deity. The number FOUR, on the other hand, has in all ages represented creation. The four points of the compass; the four winds of heaven; the four dimensions — length, breadth, depth, height; the four elements—earth, air, fire, water; the four seasons, etc Seven is the sum of THREE and FOUR and therefore unites the conceptions of creator and creation—God and man." "AND TWO OLIVE TREES BY IT." The olive tree furnished the oil that was used in the lamps. So the figure represents the rich provisions for supplying the lamps with oil. The bowl is filled continually and conducted through the pipes to the lamps and lights are thus kept burning. So Zerubbabel is made to look forward to a completed temple. The lamp and oil are beautifully illustrative of the invisible stoves of grace with which God supplies His church.

II. THE INTERPRETATION.

"NOT BY MIGHT, NOR BY POWER." The little colony at Jerusalem were at a decided disadvantage among the people of the land. Their enemies had done all they could to hinder them in their work. Letters had been written to Darius, and by false means he had been prevailed upon to forbid the Jews to continue their work. Now Zerubbabel no doubt felt the hopelessness of the task of his little band accomplishing the great desire of their hearts unless reinforcements of men and means should arrive from some quarter. But he has been looking too much to human helps. He is doing the Lord's work and it is not to be accomplished "by might nor by power" of a human kind, "BUT BY MY SPIRIT, SAITH THE LORD OF HOSTS." He who has brought them out of exile will help them in their trouble. He will enable them to surmount every difficulty. Obstacles like a "GREAT MOUNTAIN" have arisen to obstruct the work of the Lord. But formidable as these may appear "BEFORE ZERUBBABEL THEY SHALL BECOME A PLAIN." The Spirit of the Lord is a mighty leveler of mountains. The best of human equipments are insignificant in comparison to this equipment of power.

III. WORDS OF ENCOURAGEMENT.

Zerubbabel had "LAID THE FOUNDATION OF THIS HOUSE; HIS HANDS SHALL ALSO FINISH IT." If the Lord enable a man to begin a good work He also will give him power to finish it. All the force of this vision is to assure the prince of Judah of this fact. It is not for him to "DESPISE THE DAY OF SMALL THINGS." The Lord has been peculiarly favorable to small beginnings. Christianity is a marvellous demonstration of small beginnings. You may count the apples in a tree, but who can count the trees in an apple. The discouraged populace "SHALL SEE THE PLUMMET IN THE HANDS OF ZERUBBABEL" as he superintends the rebuilding of the house of the Lord. (Read chapter 2:1-5.) But he will be supported by the divine Helper. "THE EYES OF THE LORD, WHICH RUN TO AND FRO THROUGH THE WHOLE EARTH" shall be upon the work and the worker as well as upon those who worry and war against His people.

FIGS AND THISTLES.

(FROM THE RAM'S HORN.)

The deepest gulf known is the one sin has made.

Salt and light never have to go about hunting for work.

Money that is saved by robbing God won't buy much.

Drive the devil out of the family and he will soon be homeless.

Give a lie the right of way and it would wreck the universe.

Nobody wants the kind of religion that is too nice to be talked about.

Culture is only polish. It does not change the heart.

The man who most deserves a monument does not need it.

If you want to live long, don't try to live more than one day at a time.

Thank God for your trials, and the grace He gives you to bear them.

When a lazy man looks toward Heaven the angels close the windows.

Every step the wicked man takes is a step towards his own destruction.

The fact that a man wants more khowledge is proof that he has some.

Saying yes to a sin is simply saying no to Christ, no matter how small it is.

Evil thoughts always come from the devil, no matter who thinks them.

The man who will not give up his sin in this life will have to keep it in the next.

How straight we would all walk if we knew how many eyes were watching us.

We do not have to be great in anything except faith to obtain great favor with God.

It is hard for God to do much for people who can't see that they have anything to be thankful for.

God made the sun to give light, but he gave every man the right to put shutters on his windows.

—o—

For every drop we need God has an ocean to give us.

How he was Helped.

"When a boy," said a prominent member of a church, "I was much helped by Bishop Hamline, who visited at a house where I was. Taking me aside, the Bishop said: 'When in trouble, my boy, kneel down and ask God's help; but never climb over the fence into the devil's ground and then kneel down and ask help. Pray from God's side of the fence.' "Of that," said he, "I have thought every day of my life since." Continuing, he remarked: "Sanford Cobb, the missionary to Persia, helped me in another way. He said, 'Do you ever feel thankful when God blesses you?' 'Always.' 'Did you ever tell Him so?' 'Well, I don't know that I have.' 'Well, try it, my young friend, try it.' 'Tell Him so; tell Him aloud; tell Him so that you are sure that you will hear it yourself.' That was a new revelation. I found that I had been only glad, not grateful. I have been telling Him with grateful feelings ever since, to my soul's help and comfort." —Selected.

Prosperity and Growth.

"The righteous shall flourish like a palm tree; he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon." (Psalms 92: 12.) God's way of making a man rich is first to make him righteous. But cannot we really own anything on earth until we have a clear title to a mansion in heaven. All prosperity that does not have God's favor is simply an accumulation of chaff and stubble. A bad man can never own a single thing that is fireproof. But "the righteous shall flourish like a palm tree," no matter whether they own any corner lots or not. It does not take stuff that can be bought and sold to make God's children rich. Their wealth does not consist in things that can be packed in a trunk or locked up in a vault. Palm tree prosperity does not depend on weather and climate. The right kind or a good man will keep right on growing in grace, no matter whether he can have his own way or not. No matter how poor his circumstances may be he will manage somehow to be continually laying up treasure in heaven. The palm tree will grow and bear fruit anywhere, and so will a Christian. A Christian's soul will fatten and grow where that of a worldling would starve to death.—Ram's Horn

Ashamed of our Looks.

The men found by Dr. Livingstone in Africa, who had never seen a looking-glass were surprised at their own ugliness when they saw his mirror for the first time. There are no doubt men in almost every Christian congregation who would blush with shame if they had but one glimpse of their own deformity in the great moral looking-glass of God's truth. —Selected.

Field Notes.

FROM NAMPA, IOWA.

M. Larkin:—The first three months of allotted time on the Boise City circuit has about expired, and upon looking over our work, thank God, we have much to be thankful for and much to encourage us for the future. We have as kind a people to serve as any preacher need want. We have one or two young men who are full of zeal and energy, one of whom, we trust, will enter the ministry. And, Mr. Editor, we think that is the great need of our work in the West, that we may raise and train hour ministers here among us, and not have to transfer so many from the East, who sometimes are "weak and wounded, sick and sore," or the health of their wives fail the first year they are here and they have to leave the work and go back.

We have received eight members into the church since conference, have started a new church at Nampa, and have about $500, in sight and intend to proceed to build. We trust in God and the extension church board for enough to finish. If the board only knew our possibiltes in this valley they surely would not hesitate. (We know it would not if it had the means at its disposal. That is a matter that has to be taken into consideration. — Editor). We have no church house on the work. We have started churches on one or two occasions before, but the devil and some other folks knocked us out and turned the whole thing over into others' hands. But we trust we will be more successful this time. We have about forty-five members on the work, and they are faithful and true. We have three preaching places, and a good hearing at each place.

We never had a more encouraging out-look. We will say more at a future time. (Be sure you do.—Ed.)

FROM PULLMAN, WASH.

W. R. Winnifried—There is nothing of much interest here. Some scarlet fever at Palouse and other places, with a good deal of scare. Some deaths, also some from typhoid fever. Every thing seems quiet since the election.

—o—

EAST HELENA.

L. Bramble.—We have laid the fundation of our new parsonage and have commenced to build thereon.

Work is progressing. Brother C. F. Chaffman has the contract. The building is one story, frame, and will cost about $700, when completed and ready for occupancy. Our Christmas services for the Sunday-school were very interesting and higlhy satisfactory to the children and all concerned. The Sunday-school numbers about fifty members. Our congregations are good, and the outlook is hopeful.

—o—

STEVENSVILLE.

The donation party for the pastor's benefit given at Stevensville on Thursday after Christmas was a grand success. We are not informed as to the actual results, but a private note states that "the Bitter Root people tried themselves." The pastor, W. O. Waggener, commenced a protracted meeting on New Years day. Rev. R. H. Shaffer, of Helena, went to his assistance a few days latter. A note from Brother W. states: "We are having a great meeting, 3 conversions so far. Brother Shaeffer is preaching very acceptably to our people."

—o—

SYMPATHY.

Rev. E. L. Lee writes us under date of Dec. 31. "Our little babe has been very sick for the past three weeks and is now lying at the point of death. Mrs. Lee is much worn and is heartbroken. We need the prayers of our brethren." Later advices inform us that the little one was released from its sufferings on Saturday the 7th of January. We deeply sympathize with our dear Brother and Sister in their sore bereavement. We can only commend them to the great comforter who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and who has said, "My grace is sufficient for thee," and "Let not your heart be troubled. Yee believe in God, believe also in me."

—o—

OUR DOCTRINES.

The people called Methodists are not much given to defending their doctrines, perhaps not enough so. They preach their doctrines constantly and earnestly, but they do it so naturally and in such a matter of fact way that many do not think of them as distinctive doctrines. A large mass of people want something in religion that is peculiar, mysterious, supernatural, and that must be explained, argued and defended; and the more room there is for superstition or mysticism, the more ready they are to embrace it; when in reality the only supernatural thing about religion is the regeneration.

Methodists take the Bible and the teachings of the life of Christ as they find them, and they depend upon the truth for its own defense. Any dogma that needs constantly to be supported by research and conjectures, or by drawing on the redulity of the people, they regard as of questionable validity, to say the least of it. They believe that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," all of them, and hence they preach a free and full salvation with no elective lines or fatalistic misgivings.

BAPTISM.

They believe that the pouring of water is the most reasonable and scriptural sign of the spiritual baptism; though they accept the application of water, in any way in the name of the Trinity, as valid. Water is only the sign of the true cleansing, and they are not concerned as to whether the sign is a big one or a small one, so long as it signifies what they need. Because Christ and the eunuch went down to the water, or into the water, is no evidence to them that they went under the water any more, than that John the Baptist and Philip, who went with them, went under the water. Nor does it seem reasonable that such a man as the Philippian jailer should have had a pool already prepared in his house for immersion. It seems plain that he was baptied with the same conveniences as those with which he washed the stripes of Paul and Silas. "And he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes, and was baptized, he and all his straightway." In fact the doctrine of immersion is too impracticable for common use and as the reasonableness, or scriptural basis, of it can only be made probable by great circumlocution and labor, and as it must be so constantly defended, Methodists are not disposed to accept it.

Infant Baptism.

Again, Methodists believe in the baptism of children, because it is a plain command of the Master. "He says: "Go, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son and the Holy Ghost." And again, "Go, preach the gospel to every creature." Now it is so plain that children are "creatures" to be preached to, and that they are a part of "every nation" to be taught, and it is so plain that the teaching is to be accompanied with baptism, that it requires a very ingenious process of reasoning to avoid the plain command, "Go teach and baptize the children." When does child teaching commence? Then the baptism must begin and the child grow up under its influence.

BELIEVERS' BAPTISM.

In the case of adults, where baptism has been neglected at the proper time, Methodists believe in a believers' baptism. Believing, however, in the Bible sense, does not mean regeneration or what we call conversion.

Believing means the intellectual assent, and regeneration or salvation comes after and as a consequence. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." The Holy Ghost's work comes after the water baptism, and with that as a condition. Not that there is any virtue in the water or in the act even, of the baptism, but there is a meaning and purpose of heart, which is expressed in adopting baptism as the symbol of salvation, what the soul needs and wants. This purpose to "confess Christ before men" and to "follow His commandments," must always be in the heart before the Holy Ghost can do its work. The sign, and then the thing signified. Otherwise, what use have we for a sign?

This was the order, too, pursued in all the instances and teachings of the Bible, except in the case of Cornelius and his house. And the exception there was because of the prejudice and blindness of the Christian teachers. They thought the Gentiles were dogs and excluded from the rights of the gospel; and hence, God had to work in an unnatural way to open Peter's eyes and thus inaugurate the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles. In all other cases, where adults are the subjects of instruction, it is repentance, baptism, remission of sins, the work of the Holy Ghost, or regeneration.

What else Methodists believe we will tell you in the future.—Wesleyan Christian Advocate.

"Too Poor to Give."

A man who attempted to raise some money on a subscription paper for a necessary church out west, relates his experience as follows:

"The first man I went to see said he was very sorry, but the fact was he was so involved in his business that he could not give anything at the present time. Very sorry, indeed, but a man in debt, as he was, owed his first duty to his creditors. He was smoking an expensive cigar, and before I left his store he bought of a peddler who came in a pair of expensive Rocky Mountain cuff-buttons.

"The next man I went to was a young clerk in a banking establishment. He read the paper over, acknowledged that the church was very greatly needed, but said that he was owing for his board, was badly in debt otherwise, and did not see how he could give anything. That afternoon, as I went by the base-ball grounds, I saw this young man pay fifty cents at the entrance to go in, and saw him mount the grand stand where special seats were sold for a quarter of a dollar.

"The third man to whom I presented the paper was a farmer living near the town. He also was sorry but times were hard, his crops had been a partial failure, the mortgage on his farm was a heavy load, the interest was coming due, and he really couldn't see his way clear to give to the church, although he freely acknowledged it was just what the new town needed. A week from that I saw the same farmer drive into town with his entire family, and go to the circus afternoon and night, at an expense of at least four dollars.

"The Bible says, 'Judge not that ye be not judged,' but it also says, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' And I really could not help thinking that the devil could use that old excuse, 'In debt,' to splendid advantage, especially when he had a selfish man to help him."—Youth's Companion.

The Talent of Youth.

By many parables Jesus has sought to make very plain to us the fact that we are, each one of us, intrusted with certain talents, for the use of which we are responsible directly to Him. His gifts, as varied as our circumstances, our personality, or our age, are our opportunities. They are our capital with which we are to trade, and through which we may grow rich, if we will, in eternal treasure. One of the talents given to each of us, a talent which we do not recognize or value until it has slipped from us in our youth. Every moment of the early years of life is a diamond of priceless opportunity for receiving and for giving the good things of God. The brain and heart are susceptible of impressions in the first years of life, as they are not later on. The books we read, the lectures and sermons we hear, from fifteen to twenty-five, are of utmost importance to us. They make impressions that are never swept out by the ebb and flow of the tide. And what if we, forgetful or careless of the talents of youth intrusted to us, neglect to read or to listen to the best at our command? It is a loss irreparable.

Let your amusements be of the higher order, too. There is plenty of wholesome, hearty recreation and genuine merriment which is good for both body and soul. It is an immense pity that so much talent of youth should be wasted in that which is ignoble and base under the name of amusement. The talent of youth! it is exceedingly precious; we have it such a little while; we see the tiny bud, the opening leaf, the fragrant blossom, the maturing fruit—and lo! it is autumn, and there is nothing left to do but accept the results of the seedtime, whether bounteous or meager.

The talent of youth is not only to be used in receiving, but also in giving, the good things of God. And when we say the good things of God we must remember that every good gift is from above, and cometh from above, and cometh from our Father. There are many gifts of God peculiar to youth-time. One of these is buoyancy and brightness of spirit over which the cares and disappointments of years have not cast a shadow. If you are young and happy, remember it is God's gift, and share the gladness with those who are older and sadder than yourself.

The power of personal influence cannot be too highly estimated by young men or women. Especially is it so in Christian service and in Christian testimony. Young people expect those who are older to have a decided and mature experience; they expect of them correctness in deportment and activity in work; they say: "It is well enough for them, but I am young yet; by and by I may go and do likewise."

But when one of their own number gives testimony to a clear knowledge of sins forgiven and conscious favor with God, when the life is consistent with the spoken word, what effect it has! Naturally the inference is that the same experience may and should be felt in the heart and lived in the life of other young persons as well. Too often are we robbed of golden opportunities by the temptation to wait until we are older before using any or all of the talents intrusted to our keeping. Wise and happy is the young man or woman who says from the depth of a sincere spirit:

"Just as I am—young, strong, and free,
To be the best that I can be
For truth and righteousness and Thee,
Lord of my life, I come!"

The Roman Slave.

Blandina was a Roman slave girl; one of a despised, down-trodden race, for whom life held little of love and less of pleasure. What marvel then when to her was made known the story of Jesus' love, that it filled her heart to overflowing with gratitude: Was it possible the Incarnate God Himself loved her? that He had stooped to a slave's death to redeem and bless the slave? Matchless grace! To her heart the name of Christ became exceedingly precious; but her fidelity was to be sorely tried.

A fierce persecution of the Christians was then raging in Rome. Blandina was arrested. The delicate girl of sixteen was racked, scourged, and her flesh torn with iron hooks to induce her to deny her Redeemer. In vain. All that torture could wring from her was the repeated declaration: "I am a Christian!" "I am a Christian!" words which would seem to support her wonderfully. When exposed at last to be torn by wild beasts, a calm, sweet smile rested upon her face, and with the name of Christ upon her lips, the poor slave passed home to the glory-land.

Dear young reader, the Bible speakes of all who are not yet God's children as being slaves to sin. What a dreadful fact! But the Lord Jesus died a slave's death to redeem the slave. Has He redeemed you? Are you one of the redeemed? Is His name as precious to you as it was to this poor child, who could rejoice amid the bitterest suffering that she was "counted worthy to suffer shame for His name?" Are you ashamed of Jesus, or have you courage to confess His name by living a holy life to His honor and glory?—Sel.

THE VICIOUS CLASS.

BY ANTHONY COMSTOCK.

In general this term is very comprehensive. In common speech it encircles within its scope a very considerable portion of the community. One class would apply the term "vicious class" to murderers and thieves. A policeman will declare that the "vicious class" are those who make life burdensome to him on his beat by loafing on street corners. Prohibitionists will tell you that the rumseller is the principal source of vice and crime. Others will collect the occupants of houses of ill-fame, dives, etc., under this head. Many thoughtless ones group together those who dwell together in the precincts of squalor and want as the "vicious class," making no distinction between innocent women and helpless children, who are dragged down because perchance one member of their family has given loose rein to appetite or passion and forced disgrace, destitution and shame upon the innocent ones of his household.

For the purpose of this article, however, I submit that the "vicious class"—those most to be dreaded—are those who create crimes where they do not exist, and foster them where they do exist; who defy laws and prey upon the weaknesses and infirmities of men to get rich.

There are three great sources of crime that must plead guilty to this indictment—to wit: Intemperance, gambling and evil reading. The harvests from the seed sowing of these three vice breeders in the community are doing more to degrade society, hinder the progress of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, undermine common honesty and fair dealing, and overthrow the safeguards of good government, than any or all other evil influences combined. These are essentially vicious because they breed crimes, disorder, poverty and want.

Religion and morals are the foundation of all good government. Those who overthrow these safeguards must be treated as traitors to their country and foes to its highest interests.

The encroachment of these crime breeders is becoming each year more and more alarming, particularly as they are intrenching their position by bribing and corrupting officials, repealing righteous statutes, destroying elective franchise, and throwing obstacles in the way of the proper enforcement of law for the preservation of public peace and order.

I am not disposed to denounce the victim of either of these great crime-breeding influences as particularly vicious above all other criminals. It is hoped that the time is not far distant when public sentiment will assert itself with sympathy for the tempted victim, and with indignant condemnation of these fruitful sources of crime and immorality.

My conclusions then are: That those who make drunkards, paupers, criminals, who destroy peace and good order, undermine common honesty and industrious habits, wreck homes, impoverish helpless women and defenseless children, are pre-eminently the "vicious class." We should denounce the promoters of crime—the seed sowers of evil—rather than the result of their crafty machinations.

The question is asked: "What is the attitude of the Church toward the 'vicious class,' and the attitude of the 'vicious class' toward the Church?" I answer: The attitude of the "vicious class" is hostile to the Church, because the restraints of religion curtail the license to sinful practices.

The attitude of the Church is too often criminally passive and indifferent. The Church frequently occupies a position corresponding to the ambulance corps of an army who care for the wounded and the dying, instead of taking those wise precautions indicated by the Advance Guard, whose duty it is to locate masked batteries, discover the strength of the enemy, fire sunken mines and prevent catastrophe by putting the enemy to confusion and dislodging them from their strong-holds.

In dealing with the subjects of intemperance, gambling and licentiousness, ministers are frequently moral cowards. They dare not sound the tocsin of alarm from their pulpits for fear of giving offense. Good people are ready to respond in support of the grand work of city missions (which is practically the ambulance corps of the Church seeking by the grace of God to restore sinful men and women after they have fallen), and yet unwisely forget to use or cowardly shrink from using precautions against such dread results as those they seek to ameliorate.

While the Church is thus shrinking and cowardly and oftentimes criminally indifferent to the importance of preventing the seed-sowing of vice and crime, we have the foes of the Church, to wit: organized infidels of this nation, lending their support to efforts to overthrow, ay! even brazenly demanding the repeal of all laws which recognize God as the Supreme Ruler of nations and his Son Jesus Christ as the Savior of the world. This was illustrated a few years ago when the infidels and free-lovers of this country organized themselves together as the National Liberal League, with R. G. Ingersoll, Vice-President, and then demanded, not only the repeal of the laws against the importation into this country of obscene and lewd matter, the printing and selling of the same in the District of Columbia, Territories, navy yards and provinces over which Congress had exclusive jurisniction, the transmission of such devil's wares through the mails, but also at the same time demanded "No God in the Constitution or Civil Government," "Abrogation of all laws for the public appropriation of money for educational or charitable institutions," "Abrogation of all Sabbath laws," "The abolishing of the appointment by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts," "That the judicial oaths in courts and in all departments of the Government should be abolished," and "That all chaplains in Congress, State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, prisons, asylums and public institutions should be dismissed and discontinued." This organization for years publicly demanded these things, and in addition to this, "That all laws looking to the enforcement of Christian morality should also be abrogated," and "All religious service of every name sustained by the Government," not only should be abolished, but that "The Bible should not be admitted in the public school either as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship."

This class of persons are superlatively vicious, as they insult the God of the universe, ignore the hallowed influences of religion, break down the restraints of morality, and open wide the flood gates for the free outflow of obscenity, indecency and all kinds of immorality.

But, you may ask, "What of the poor and the degraded—those who have sunk below the level of decent society, and wallow in the slums?" For twenty years I have seen this class dragged into the police court—the harvest of these three great crime breeders. I have seen young women brought into court with the blush of shame for the first arrest, and perhaps the first exposure of sinful and vicious living, and yet in a very few years I have seen them bloated wretches—objects of abhorrence to everyone whose eyes rest upon them. Tracing out lives of young men who have been bitten by one of these poisonous reptiles — intemperance, gambling, evil reading or licentiousness—I have seen the harvest gathered in in ruined lives, desperation and untimely graves.

With these results all about us the apathy and indifference of Christian men and women is appalling. Even good men and good women not only withhold their sympathy from efforts to check the pernicious influences of the wicked, but often ridicule and unjustly criticise the efforts made by devoted men and women to prevent the seed sowing which leads step by step down to the lowest degredation known to our civilization.

This nation cannot hope to escape the inevitable consequences of the seed sowing of vice and crime if it tolerates intemperance, gambling, evil reading and uncleanness. These are moral pestilences, scourges worse than the plagues of Egypt, that are fostered, licensed and encouraged ofttimes because there is great wealth to be accumulated through them from the weakness of mankind.

We must stop the seed-sowing, or the harvest will soon bury the blessings of free government in obloquy and disgrace, and bring upon this nation the judgment of a holy God. History is replete with instances where men have turned away from the Most High, and nations that have run riot in vicious living, have been swept out of existence by the judgment of God. Sacred and profane history, and the laws of Nature proclaim "after the seed-sowing cometh the harvest," and "as the seed sown so the harvest must inevitably be."

Traduce not the victim of the drink curse, while the cause of his ruin is protected by the copartnership of the State under license laws.

Hale not the defaulter, embezzler and thief to prison while the statute books are blotted with the accursed Ives Pool bill, authorizing the temptations of the gambling fraternity of robbers, sharpers and thieves.

Turn not away in holy horror from the victim of youthful indiscretion, while the sensational writers of modern filth and trash are outside of prison walls. Hope not to better the condition of those who live in the precincts of squalor and want unless the pestholes of contagion are closed and the renewing grace of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ shall be applied to the hearts of the stricken, tempted and accursed. The laws of suppression and repression must be enforced, apace with the preaching of the Word of Life, and the restoring, converting and healing influences of mission and social reforms. The sewer pipes that are belching forth poisonous gases into the community, especially through the "gin mill," "dive," disorderly house, devil's printing press, etc., must be closed; otherwise religion and morals will be infected, diseased, corrupted, debased and overthrown.—N. Y. Independent.

Private fortunes of the ancients.—Croesus possessed, in landed property, equal to $8,500,000, besides a large amount of money, slaves, and furniture, which amounted to an equal sum. He used to say that a citizen who had not sufficient fortune to support an army or a legion, did not deserve the title of a rich man. The philosopher, Seneca, had a fortune of $17,500,000. Tiberius, at his death, left $118,625,000, which Caligula spent in less than twelve months. Vespasian, on ascending the throne, estimated that all the expenses of State at $175,000,000. The debt of Milo amounted to $3,500,000. Caesar, before he entered upon any office, owed $15,000,000. He had purchased the friendship of Curio for $2,500,000, and that of Lucius Paulus for $15,000,000; he owed this sum on the ides of March, and it was paid before the kalends of April; he squandered $735,000,000 of the public treasures. Appius squandered in debauchery $2,500,000, and finding on examination of the state of his affairs, that he had only $400,000, he poisoned himself, because he considered that sum insufficient for his maintenance. Julius Caesar gave Servilla, the mother of Brutus, a pearl of the value of $200,000.

The Good Samaritan.

By Rev. S. W. Cope.

The good Samaritan,
As he went on his way;
Showed mercy to a man in need,
Wounded and robbed that day.
Go thou and do likewise.

The thieves had stripped him bare,
And left him for half dead;
This good man, all his needs supplied,
Bound up his wounds that bled.
Go thou and do likewise.

He sat him on his beast,
And took him to an inn;
And waiting, watched him through the night,
As one of near akin.
Go thou and do likewise.

The morrow when he left,
He gave the host two pence;
And promised if he needed more,
To meet the whole expense.
Go thou and do likewise.

Go thou and do likewise,
Be neighbor to mankind;
To every nation, kindred, tribe,
The maimed, the halt, the blind.
The helpless sufferer.

S. W. Cope.

HERE AND THERE.

"It never rains but that it pours," says the old adage. Communications have been literally pouring into our office ever since new year, and still they come. This issue is given up largely to our correspondents, and we have some choice articles left over for next week. We hope our friends, will continue to favor us with reports of their labors and with short, crisp communication on live topics. Be sure to write plainly, and avoid abbreviations. If our contributors knew the time required for us to write out in full these abbreviated words before sending them to the printer, they surely would not be quite so sparing of time and paper.

From all quarters we receive words, of commendation for the "Methodist." Our friends tell us that it gets better all the time. Well, we are doing our best, under the circumstances, to make it one of the very best in the land, and we earnestly solicit our friends everywhere to unite with us in the good work.

During a recent trip to Missoula, Helena, Boulder, and Butte in the interest of our paper we heard great complaint of dull times. This is prompting some of our patrons, who feel that they must curtail expenses in every way possible, to withdraw their advertisements from the paper for a time. To make up, in part, for this loss, others have kindly consented to increase their rates. It is next to impossible to conduct a paper, especially a weekly religious paper, for a dollar a year, without some income from this source. Our friends will readily see the situation; the need of prompt action and of liberality in behalf of our enterprise. We have no fears. We are bound to succeed. But let everyone do his whole duty and help to roll up a large list of new subscribers. How many will respond to Brother Bell's proposition? Please let us hear from you at once.

While the Nation, rather the world, was listening to hear of Blaine's death, all at once the country was startled by the announcement that General Butler had passed away, Jan. 11th, 1893. His death was a great surprise, as no one seemed to know that he was ailing. He was a remarkable man. Possessing extraordinary talent, he was at one time or other on almost every side of every great political question. We suppose that in the South his name will forever be associated with silver spoons in memory of his New Orleans administration. We heard a lawyer from Mississippi, who was in Washington when the effort was made to impeach President Johnson, say that Butler's speech in arraigning Johnson was the ablest effort that he had ever heard before any court on earth. But brains without brawn—moral back bone—while it may attract and dazzle for a time will not win in the final engagement of life's great battle. Men must have the wisdom "from above," that is "pure, peaceable, easy to be entreated and full of good works." It is a character that wins in the outcome.

While out "on the wing" we spent a few hours at Boulder, hoping to see Brothers Clark and Squires engaged in a protracted meeting; in the dear old church there. But they were pressing the battle at Alhambra, where we had passed them without knowing it. We made the most of our time by visiting the homes of Sister Wade; Brother and Sister Taylor, Sister Curren and the parsonage, where we had a delightful talk with the inmates—sisters Clark and Warren. We met with numerous old friends and picked up a few mites for the "Methodist." There is much that we would like to say, but we cannot now. We saw and admired the improvements made by the preacher on the parsonage property, and heard that the church had lately been strengthened by several valuable additions.

It was here that we commenced our career as an itinerant in Montana by preaching to six grown persons one stormy November day, in 1871; here, at the home of Brother and Sister Holt, we lay sick for seven long weeks with "mountain fever" when life was despaired of by all, and here we afterwards succeeded in erecting a neat little church. How gratified to see the beautiful and growing town, now the county seat of Jefferson county, and how grateful to mark the growth of the little vine that was planted in the wilderness and watered with many tears. May nothing arise to mar the peace of hinder the growth of our cause of Boulder. May prosperity be within thy gates continually.

That was an enjoyable time spent with Britt, Alton and two other bachelors (at least they were "baching," they said)in the parsonage at Butte. "The old home isn't what it used to be—lively with pattering feet and prattling voices and the loving lullabies of admiring mothers—when Couey and afterwards Squires abode there. But like Brother David Morton, on a certain occasion, we rather enjoyed a meal or so where no woman's deft fingers had patted the panes. It reminded us of old times. But it increased our sympathy for those who are living in a way that the Bible says is not good for man to be—alone.

Brother Alton was raised in the town in which we more born—the only man we have met in the Northwest from the same spot of ground. How we talked, and talked, and talked till the wee small hours admonished us to desist. He is every inch a man, strong and robust in physique as well as in character, eloquent, energetic, and commands the respect of all. He was in the midst of a good meeting when the Spirit of the Lord was poured out. We reported the Epworth League growing and the work in a prosperous condition. We enjoyed a short visit with Brother Kemper and family. Sister Wm. Thompson, who was packing for a trip to California, and with Mr. J. T. Baldwin and family. In our rounds we secured a handsome list of bran new subscribers for the "Methodist," which of course made our joy complete.

The revival services at Stevensville continue. The Congregations are large and serious and a number of persons are being added to the church.

Thus far the winter hasbeen one of the finest that we have ever seen in Montana. At this writing there is no snow on the ground in the principal valleys. The roads are smooth and dusty, and it is just cold enough to give one a taste for healthful exercise. There is no wind, and it is simply delightful for winter weather.

We take pleasure in calling the reader's attention to our advertisements. We believe in co-operation, in helping those in this respect, who help us. We tell our friends, the business men, that we "do good unto all, especially those of the household of faith," and we consider those as belonging to the "household" who advertise in the "Methodist." They have faith in us, and pay their money to help us in our work. Let us see that their faith is honored.

—o—

Ashamed of our Looks.

The men found by Dr. Livingstone in Africa, who had never seen a looking-glass were surprised at their own ugliness when they saw his mirror for the first time. There are no doubt men in almost every Christian congregation who would blush with shame if they had but one glimpse of their own deformity in the great moral looking-glass of God's truth. —Selected.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE SUNNY SOUTH.

(By Rev. T. W. Flowers.)

Dear Methodist:—We arrived at the old home of Mrs. Flowers on last Wednesday, the 4th instant, after a visit of five days with our nieces in Natchez, Miss. Natchez is where the Mississippi Conference was held, beginning on the 14th of December, the day after I left Grantsdale, and closing the 18th, the day before I arrived in Fayette. I was very sorry that I did not get to my old conference in time to see my old friends. However, I met several of them who are yet in the active work, and one or two others who are worn out in the service of the church. Brother Ballard, who I visited while in Natchez, and who was once a faithful worker in the conference, is now prostrate and not able to be out of bed, or scarcely so. He has dropsy and heart trouble and has been thus afflicted for two years. Poor old brother! We was glad to see me and shake my hand once more. No hopes for him to be restored, but he will die happy and go home to rest. I also met Brother W. B. Lewis, my old friend, and heard him preach last Sunday. He is stationed in Natchez this year, and I anticipate he will have success in building up the church this year. He is a good preacher.

But according to my judgment religion is at a low ebb in the portion of country which I have visited. I have never seen a country so completely broken up and dilapidated as this is. Large farms once in a good state of cultivation, and producing abundant crops of cotton, corn peas, and potatoes, and other plants in the way of vegetables, to one's hearts content; now thousands of acres are growing up in almost all kinds of bushes which in some places make the thickest thickets I ever saw. Nothing looks natural. I cannot recognize scarcely any place, except the old dwelling house. How I long to be back in Montana at my work on Upper Bitter Root. I hope you are having success on the circuit. Give my love to the old friends, Your Brother.

F. W. Flowers.

Hamburg, Miss., Jan. 8.

FROM KEYTESVILLE, MO.

Dear Brother Stanley:—I have been studying about writing to you for the purpose of stopping my paper, but I could not consent to do so, for I love to hear from you out there, and I love to read your paper. My prayer is that the good Lord may bless his servants and people all over the world. When you read this scribble get your hymn-book and turn to the hymn commencing:

"Oh, for heart to praise my God.
A heart from sin set free," etc.

and there you will find the sincere desire of my heart. I want this to reach you in time to renew my subscription by the first of January.

Mrs. E. A. Adams.

(We are glad to hear from our sister, and to know that she enjoys reading the "Methodist" and is so interested in our Western work. Her letter reached us in ample time.—Editor.

FROM GALLATIN, MO.

Dear Brother—I have been sick and unable to go to the post-office, the reason that I have not sent you the dollar before. When the time runs out, if I do not send any more money, you may stop my paper. I will be 82 years old in June, if I live till then. I am very feeble. I do not expect any one has enjoyed the "Montana Methodist" more than I have. I there learned of the death of my last school teacher, Rev. Thomas Johnson, also our old minister, who has gone to rest. May God's richest blessings attend you and the paper, is the prayer of a true friend.

Mrs. J. D. Coulson.

(We do not expect to stop the paper so long as we are in charge of it and our dear mother in Israel is alive and wishes to take it. Her subscription is paid up to October, 1894, and if she is not able to renew at that time, we will find a friend who will do so for her. We rejoice that the "Methodist" has brought comfort to many people. The church owes a debt of gratitude to our venerable mothers in Israel that it can never fully repay. Their presence among us, their consistent lives, their faith, their hope, and their prayers are an inspiration to those of us who are now bearing the brunt of the battle or just buckling on the armor "Their strongest trials now are past, their triumph is begun." They linger in Beulah land, on the borders of the better world and are only waiting the call to "come up higher." Their conversation is in heaven, and they carry its very atmosphere with them. Let us strive to make their last years among us the brightest and happiest of all. "Eighty-two years old." How many labors, conflicts and trials, how much of valiant service to God and humanity do they represent. What a joy and crown of rejoicing will they bring "in the crowning day that's coming bye and bye."—Editor.

FROM BROTHER PARNALL.

Editor "Montana Methodist:"—merically the strongest, but it is Having hitherto, from some unexplained cause or other, failed to secure a single copy of the "Methodist" since coming here, I had purposed to delay sending another communication until I had first learned the news from the friends in Montana through its pages. There is now, however, such a blockade on the mountain wagon road leading to this locality as to prevent our newspaper mail from reaching us, that I have determined not to wait any longer lest some might erroneously think we had lost interest in the work and the workers from whom we were reluctantly compelled to part so recently. Having now spent nearly three months at this place, we have had sufficient time to carefully look around us and take our bearings, so to speak.

Geographically, Coquille City is situated on the Coquille River, a sluggish navigable stream which affords the most convenient highway for travel that is attainable, especially in the winter. The surrounding country is quite hilly and heavily timbered. Nearly all the available farming land is found in the river bottom, and but a few acres suffice to afford a living to an ordinary family—the farmers don't seem to make money very fast, some say they do not want to. Dairying and vegetable raising seem to be the most profitable, some kinds of fruit also do well, but the summers are not warm enough for the other varieties to mature perfectly. Lumbering and coal mining are the principal industries, but as the capitalists who operate these do not pay their employes in cash, money is exceedingly scarce and nearly everybody seems to be in debt, and quite content to remain so. There are about 800 inhabitants living in Coquille City, a good portion of them being juveniles. An academy conducted by the Seventh Day Adventists attracts a great many families to the town for the educational advantages that it offers. Three church buildings may be seen, one belonging to the Universalists, who formerly predominated here, another belonging to the Disciples, which for the present they are unable to complete, and the third, with a seating capacity of about 220, belongs to the M. E. Church South. There is but one liquor shop in town—a creditable showing so far as it goes, the lack of ready cash, however, largely accounts for it. I am the only resident minister, and supply all the regular preaching that the people now receive except on one Sunday a month when the M. E. preacher from Myrtle Point, occupies our pulpit whilst I preach at a country appointment. Next to the Adventists our church is nu- almost entirely composed of the weaker sex, some of whom are, however, very energetic and devoted. It seems to be fashionable here for the married men to relegate their religious affairs to the care of their wives, but even a great many of the latter prefer the ways of their irreligious husbands to those of their godly sisters. An unconverted father is bad enough in a family, but for the mother to be devoid of piety is indeed a calamity—I might say a disgrace.

Our congregations are good on Sunday nights. The attendance at the Sunday-school in the afternoon is also excellent. The pastor, when present, superintends. The Sunday-school we regard as the most hopeful feature of the work. We are now preparing for revival services to be held in conjunction with the second quarterly meeting, which is appointed for next Saturday and Sunday week. A mighty work of grace is needed here to stir this "Valley of dry bones", where so much infidelity, indifference, and worldliness prevail. May the Lord bestow it upon us!

But this does not look much like taking the rest that I left Montana for, some one will perhaps be saying or thinking. Well, thank the Lord, I have already had a rest—an outbreak of small-pox in town gave me a rest for about a month. Benefiting by that, and with the aid of the soft, soothing atmosphere here, exercising caution also in not overtaxing myself, I am now enabled by the blessing of the Lord to preach twice on Sunday and conduct the Sunday-school without suffering very much fatigue and weakness afterwards. The nervousness that so greatly troubled both Mrs. Parnall and myself has almost entirely disappeared in this quieting atmosphere. For all this we are devoutly thankful, although we are not yet so strong as to feel justified in throwing ourselves into church work with the unwise prodigality of energy that perhaps has sometimes been characteristic of us in the past.

This part of Oregon is pre-eminently Missionary ground. The people are, as a rule, very poor. The preachers and church buildings are comparatively few and scattering, even these cannot be sustained without help from the outside, and their number ought to be considerably augmented. Self-support cannot possibly be practiced here for many years to come, unless the country quickly improves financially.

We do not complain however. The "barrel of meal and cruse of oil" have no failed yet, and will not do so whilst we do our duty and trust in Elijah's God, as we mean to do. J. B. Parnall.

Coquille, Or., Jan. 4, 1893.

P. S.—Have you learned the sad news of the sudden death of Brother Ligon, the bright promising young pastor of our church at Corvallis? He was killed last week by the awning of a store falling upon him. The conference could ill afford to spare so useful a man as he was increasingly showing himself to be.

Ezra VI. 14-22.

DEDICATING THE TEMPLE.

BY AMOS R. WELLS.

TEACHING HINTS.

The central theme of the lesson is the church. What makes a church? Why is a church to be prized? What services are due the church? What is required of leaders in a church, and of members as well? What is the value of Church ordinances? These five questions, drawn out of the experience of Zerubbabel's Jews and applied to our modern religious life, constitute a sufficient outline of the lesson. It would be best not to take the verses in order, but to raise these points, one after another, letting the scholars answer them first by reference to the lesson story and then by discussing modern conditions.

BLACKBOARD HINTS.

The temple is finished. Let us look back and see how it was built. It was founded on obedience, on teachableness. The walls were raised with enthusiasm. It was money and labor that put on the roof. The whole was crowned with prayer. Bring out these points by questioning, writing on the blackboard as you proceed the words, "Teachableness, Enthusiasm, Money, Prayer, Labor, Enthusiasm." Enthusiasm comes in twice, but it won't hurt to have a great deal of it. What do the first letters of these words spell? Yes, those are the things that made a temple in Zerubbabel's day, and make a church in our day. Let the leader show how these five things make a church by printing the words so as to form a neat outline of a church front TEACHABLENESS the base; ENTHUSIASM on each side the walls, upright and downright; MONEY and LABOR sloping up to form the roof, and PRAYER the spire pointing to heaven. Turn the board aside and see if the children can tell you what makes up a church, a temple.

EXPLANATORY NOTES.

ELDERS (v. 14). Zerubbabel and Jeshua and such "chief of the fathers." CYRUS, DARIUS, ARTAXERXES (v. 14). The first sent home Zerubbabel and his company, the second permitted this completion of the temple, the third, sixty years later, sent forth Ezra and his expedition. ADAR (v. 15) February; the last month of the Jewish year. PRIESTS IN THEIR DIVISIONS (v. 18). This was simply an emphasizing of an old system, introduced in its rudiments, at least, by David. There were twenty-four of these "courses," serving in turn for a week at a time. "LEVITES IN THEIR COURSES" (v. 18). The Levites were those members of the tribe of Levi who were not, as were the priests, of the family of Aaron. IN THE BOOK OF MOSES (v. 18). Moses, in Numbers, lays down the duties of priest and Levite, but not their division into courses. THE PASSOVER (v. 19). Review the original institution of the passover as given in Exodus, and compare the accounts of the famous passovers of Hezekiah's (2 Chron. 30) and Josiah's (2 Chron. 35) times, as well as the solemn fast, later, in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 9). PURIFIED. (v. 20). From the ceremonial defilements described in Leviticus. THE FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD. (v. 22). For an explanation see Exodus xii. 15. THE KING OF ASSYRIA, —usually referred to by the larger title, king of Persia.

COMMENT.

THE ELDERS BUILDED (v. 14). Probably the "elders" did no building at all, but were merely the overseers of the work. We need to learn, however, what Ezra well knew from experience, that the man who plans, directs, encourages, inspires, and bears the heavy burden of responsibility, is above all the true builders of any undertaking. It is the fashion, nowadays, to exalt the worker who does with his hands what he is told to do, and depreciate the worker who guides the hands of others. Each to his calling, as God has fitted him; but if a man wants easy work, let him be a subordinate.

THEY PROSPERED THROUGH THE PROPHESYING (v. 14). Men of spiritual insight and force are the most profitable citizens a community can count in its census. They may not own a mill, but they build the foundations on which all factories rest. They may not hold an office, but they make government possible. They may not own much property, but they have contributed to the coffers of every man in the community.

ACCORDING TO THE COMMANDMENT OF GOD.....AND.....OF CYRUS (v. 14). A strange conjunction, yet one constantly occurring. Some sceptics speak as if modern philosophy had discovered the thought of God's personal and direct moving upon and in humanity, upon good men and men not so good. On the contrary, no thought appears more frequently on Bible pages.

THIS HOUSE WAS FINISHED (v. 15). What did it mean, this finishing of the temple, that it should be the climax of half our quarter's studying, and of three books of the Bible? If it meant merely so many blocks of stone and so much wood and mortar, the time of the Jews and of us was wasted. But since it meant the establishment of a national centre, and that centre God, too much time can hardly be spent in the study of it, that we may learn how to give to our own churches' supremacy over the hearts of men. It is the loftiest thing done by men,—the true establishment of a true church.

ISRAEL (v. 16). It is no more Judah and Israel; sorrow and trial have welded the people into a united nation again.

WITH JOY (v. 16). It sometimes seems that an exile of months from our churches would be good for us, that we might learn to appreciate, at their full value, the blessings we enjoy there. Sometimes God sends this exile in the form of sickness, or the sickness of loved ones, and with what joy we return to the dear precincts! But why must we lose a thing before we learn its value?

AND OFFERED (v. 17). To be sure, most of these animals were "offered" by being eaten by the worshipers themselves; but that was all right since God commanded it. Sometimes our sacrifices to God are things given up to others; but often our loving Father calls upon us to give ourselves delights, in honor to him, and that he may rejoice with his rejoicing children.

DIVISIONS, COURSES (v. 18). If service is to be given to God at all, it must be service well ordered. It is very fine to talk about spontaneity and volunteers, and all that, but disorder is the poorest imaginable soil for spontaneity. The church makes a great mistake that distrusts methods and trusts to impulse, for impulses find in methods their best provocatives to action and channels for it. Things that move spontaneously are always things organized.

CHILDREN OF THE CAPTIVITY (v. 19). What access of life is given to old forms by new experiences! These returned captives were brought by their sufferings into a closer touch with Moses and his nation of freedmen than any intervening generation had felt. In like fashion, how dull and senseless seems the Lord's Supper and baptism, until we have died with Christ and risen into his life!

WERE PURIFIED (v. 20). We are all, now, priests unto God, and no most scrupulous law of purity is too strict for a Christian. That those who wish to see God must be pure in heart, all Christians agree; that comes first. But why not extend the purity into the smallest and least important matters, as minutely as Leviticus enjoins? Care that the hands should be clean, the finger nails unoffensive, the hair tidy, the clothes brushed,—is this too much to expect of every one who believes that his body is the temple of the Holy Ghost?

SEPARATED THEMSELVES (v. 21). There came in Nehemiah's time, a stern separation, that is the best commentary on the separation mentioned here. Wise men will look ahead, and when thay see that parting from anything that is going to be demanded in the future,—they will not go near it at all.

THE LORD MADE THEM JOYFUL (v. 22). While we praise God for the causes of our joy, let us praise him also for the joy itself, since he gives us that as really as he gives us those. —Golden Rule.

Our Intercessor.

How inspiring is the thought, that when Christ was upon the earth, He prayed for us. Just a few hours before his death, when his soul was burdened with its own sorrow, His unselfish heart remembered those whom He was about to leave. When asking God to keep them—to keep them from the sin that is in this world, He also said: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them that shall believe on me through their word." But was this prayer for believers in general? No indeed; we are told many times, both by Christ and the Father, that He knoweth them that are His, and sweetly adds, "He calleth them by name." How assuring are the words, "the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are His," and "The Lord is good, and a stronghold in the day of trouble, and He knoweth them that trust in Him." How cheering are the words of the Good Shepherd, "I am the Good Shepherd and know my sheep, and am known of mine. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me." Yes, "many! O Lord, my God, are thy thoughts which are to us-ward." And how tenderly Christ said to Peter, "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." What a mighty fortress for our faith such assurances are!

With these assurances that Christ knows us, and also that He prayed for individuals, we can, with the greatest confidence, claim an interest in His prayer.

Jesus, in His divine wisdom, foresaw our weak condition. For, "He knoweth our frame, He remembereth that we are dust;" and therefore by His prayer sought to help us.

What strength, what grace, has come to us, in answer to His prayer! If we rejoice at the thought that the prayer of the righteous availeth much, how much more that of our blessed Redeemer!

But we do not need look back to the time when Jesus was on the earth, but we are taught, "He ever liveth to make intercession for us." And of the Spirit it is said, "He maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered." O! how we need this divine help, we know not even how to pray, much less how to live a righteous life, but if we accept this help from Christ, it will encourage us, and fill our souls with an inspiration to "press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God, in Christ Jesus."

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM BROTHER LEE.

"HEAVEN FEELS VERY NEAR NOW."

Townsend, Mont., Jan. 9, 1893.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—Our baby boy died Saturday morning, Jan. 7th. We buried him Sunday, by the side of his little sister. God has given us four, but has required two of them at our hands. It seems hard, but I realize that He has only taken them to a far better home than we can possibly provide for them. He was spared to us two months lacking two days. He was a sufferer five weeks of his earthly existence, and the last week was one of intense pain. Just as our baby was dying I received the sad news that my youngest sister, living in Oklahoma, died on the 27th of December. I have as yet received no particulars. I find God's grace a very present help. He who is able is an unfailing support in this trying hour. Mrs. Lee says that heaven feels very near. We need the prayers of our brethren.

Yours in His name,
E. L. Lee.

HOW THE BATTLE IS GOING.

FIELD NOTES.

By J. E. Squires, P. E.

Dear "Methodist": — Your weekly visits are much more satisfactory than when you came but twice a month. And I am reminded that we contributors must send more often if not so long. The Montana weather is perfect here, and has been for two weeks, before which time we had a few very cold days. The meeting was in progress at Bozeman and I had to spend the Sunday with Bro. Tabor, at which time the tide had arisen to a good point, but the exceeding cold weather well-nigh closed us out. Bro. Schaffer had come over to make the team as strong as possible, but we could not brook the elements and so we both left Thursday for our families, having seen little fruit of our labor. The meetings yet continue. I must here mention the heroism of a young brother Glasgow, whose home was in Kentucky, but has been some time in Eastern Montana, and has within the past few months yielded to the call to the Holy Ministry, and so written Bro. Tabor. Knowing that I was to be with Bro. Tabor until over Tuesday, and not being able to pay his way on the train, having loaned out the little money in his hand, walked over the range from near Chico, Mont., about 45 miles through deep snow and the thermometer at 18 degrees below zero. I think he will make a preacher—he is now with brother Warren, of Belgrade..

By special planning I spent Christmas day at home and held the Quarterly Meeting at Deer Lodge. This charge is moving along nicely under the careful pastorate of Bro. Britt. The beginning of the new year was given to Butte City, the service commencing Friday night and growing in interest to the close on Sunday night, at which time a crowded house met us. Bro. Alton is doing well at this most important center. My family accompanied me and we made our home at the good home of J. W. Kemper.

BOULDER, MONT.

R. S. Clark:—We have taken two into our church since conference. We have just finished painting the parsonage, inside and out, and a fence enclosing it is almost complete. The front, including one panel back on each side, is of pickets nicely prepared, and the rest is made of plank with a dressed face. The painting and the enclosure add much to the appearance and value of the property.

DEER LODGE NOTES.

We have just closed a very pleasant and profitable week of prayer service in connection with the other churches of the town. The meetings were well attended and served to revive all the churches participating in them in the great interests of the church universal. I must express my surprise that our Board of Missions should have selected this week as a week of prayer and self-denial in the interest of our missionary debt. In the first place it was to be expected that nearly all our churches in towns of this size and smaller would unite with other churches in a union week of prayer. In the next place, coming just after Christmas there is a general scarcity of spending money, owing to its free use during the holidays. It seems to me, if the week before Christmas had been designated it might have turned much of the money into the missionary treasury which in fact went for useless presents. We will not forget the missionary debt, but could not give it much thought during the week of prayer for all churches.

The second day of Jan. was made sad by the death of Bro. W. A. Hensley. He was a most patient sufferer for several months and is the gainer now we trust by what is our loss. Bro. Squires preached his funeral at our church and wrote the inclosed obituary.

Our second quarterly meeting embraced Christmas day. The quarterly conference was held the Wednesday night after. The reports at the conference were encouraging. We have a good Sunday School, alive Epworth League, an interesting children's meeting every Saturday afternoon, a working Ladies' Aid Society, and the Little Workers, managed by Miss Margaret Evans.

EAST COLUMBIA CONFERENCE MISSIONARY DEBT.

Brethren, the time is approaching which has been set for the "complete extinguishment of our Missionary debt." I know that each one of you likes that thought—complete wiping out of the debt. All our preachers and laymen heartily indorse the idea, and are ready to join in bearing their part. The ready response of those present at conference in subscribing so liberally showed their interest. The time for paying those subscriptions is now at hand. Every dollar paid now will reduce the interest the Parent Board is having to pay. Let us begin the new year by sending in this offering to the Lord's work. The amount asked of our conference is only $158. I hope we will not stop short of $200. To reach this latter amount will not require many offerings in addition to the amount already subscribed. How many will send a New Year's offering to this good cause? Who would fail to bear a part of this glorious burden? Are there not those who will send, some $10? some $5? some $2? and some $1? Any amount will help. One noble brother in our bounds, unsolicited except by his love for the cause, sent $100 for this cause about a year ago. He was not a rich man either, except in faith and good works. There are many who will do what they can, I trust. Send the amount on, great or small. The Lord will bless the giver.

To those who have subscribed, and all who will aid, send the money to the undersigned, at Spokane, Wash. If it is more convenient to some of you, pay to Rev. M. V. Howard. He will report to me, as I hold the subscription list. I will forward the money to the Treasurer, at Nashville, and will receipt for all amounts sent me and make report to our annual Conference Board next Conference.

Remember, brethren, this money should all be in the Treasure's hands before the 31st of March.

Reg. B. Swift, Conference Solicitor, Spokane Wash.

SPOKANE DISTRICT.

A sad note from Palouse City informs me that our dear Bro. J. W. Compton fainted in his pulpit last Sunday night. He is better now, I learn; able to sit up some. He had been very busy, preparing to hold revival services, which he had commenced that day. He was completely prostrated "from overwork and cold," the physician says. It is thought he can resume his work probably in two weeks. Prayers will be made by many, we trust, that this faithful pioneer of our work may soon be able to resume his loved employ.

This scribe began his second round last Saturday at Rockford, where he remained three days with the pastor, Rev. E. P. Warren, who is continuing the meeting. He is pushing the battle, with his accustomed vim and earnestness. The prospect was very encouraging for a fine revival. He is assisted by Bro. Simms, of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, and Bro. Gibson, pastor of the M. E. Church. When these good men begin the new year in an effort together in Christ's name for the salvation of souls we expect the Lord to reveal himself in mighty saving power.

Mr. Editor, one of my New Year resolves is, to do better in reporting to the papers our work. So I begin with a few notes this week.

Reg. B. Swift.

Jan. 6th, '93.

FROM SPOKANE.

Dear "Methodist:"—After a short delay I will again attempt to pen you a few lines.

The holidays are over and all have returned to their duties. We hope, Mr. Editor, you enjoyed your share of gifts, lots of turkey, and a pleasant Christmas. The church here is alive and at work, the pastor earnest and attentive and it is hoped, the revival soon to commence will prove a revival in the hearts of the members, and an awakening in the city, such as has never before been known. Our meeting will begin the 22nd of Jan. and Bro. Craig will be assisted by Bro. Shelton, of Dayton, and others.

Our Sunday School has elected M. F. Warren as Superintendent, also made several changes among the teachers and officers. Bro. Warren seems to begin as though he had always been adapted to the work, and trust our school will more than double its number this year of '93.

Bro. Compton, of Palouse, came up to have his eyes treated and consult a physician in regard to his recent ill health. Bro C. has quit preaching for a short time, and his illness tells greatly on his familiar face. We are very sorry to hear of it, and hope for him a speedy recovery.

Bro. Majors, a transfer from South Carolina, arrived in Spokane Monday night, en route for Volmer, Idaho, where he will labor the coming year. Bro. Majors is a young man full of intellect, and we welcome him to the West, and hope he may continue in good health, have good success, and find warm friends, and the "latch string hanging on the outside of the door that he may enter and find a home within."

Miss Della Dyer has, after 12 weeks of confinement to the house with fever, again resumed her usual duties as teacher and organist. We all welcome her back with her pleasant smile.

The Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission Society is doing good work here for our church. At the beginning of the new year the ladies gave a New Year's dinner in the Auditorium Store rooms, serving a delicious dinner of chicken, turkey, salads, cakes, jellies, pies and coffee, and lunch in the evening; everything being of the best quality and well cooked. During the day they voted on the most popular newspaper in the city, the "Chronicle" taking the lead by a majority of four. They presented the editor of the "Chronicle" with a gold pen as a token of good luck for '93. Our pastor was on hand smiling and sociable, getting acquainted and making things pleasant for all.

The dinner proved a success, both financially and edibly, making about $67.00 after all expences were paid, which the good ladies gave for paying for the parsonage furniture and other expenditures, leaving $8.00 in their treasury. We surely think they did well and hope "there is still more to follow."

They are having a union service this week at the Methodist Tabernacle, and last Sabbath the ministers in the city exchanged pulpits both morning and evening. Rev. Davies, of the Congregational, preaching for us in the morning and Rev. Beaven of the First Baptist preaching in the evening.

Bro. Skee is holding a meeting at Fairview and we hear is having good success. Bro. Majors goes to assist him. The Aid Society will give a dime social at Mrs. Cardwell's, Friday night.

FROM LEWISTOWN, IDAHO

At the last session of the Tennessee Conference, I was transferred to the East Columbia conference to follow Brother H. B. Terry on the Lewistown circuit.

We (my wife and I) left Tennessee November 27th, and arrived in Lewistown, December 7th. Since our arrival the thought has occurred to me that I could become partially acquainted with the "brethren" of this section through your paper. I want to say that I am highly pleased with my new work. Our people received us with warm hearts and open arms. We have a beautiful new church about twelve miles from town, the result of Bro. Terry's labors. Since our arrival we have been at work to organize a society in Lewistown, and bless God, I believe we are going to succeed.

The Hon. James Reid, Isaac Mounce, and others have gone into their pockets, and rented us a nice church and organ, ordered our Sunday School literature, one dozen and a half hymn books, twenty-five testaments, one dozen disciplines, and a great many other things which are too numerous to mention. God bless these good brethren. Brethren, we are laboring for the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord in these quarters. When you pray remember us, and in making up your number count us one.

W. B. Taylor.

We rejoice at receiving this cheering note from our brother. It has the right ring. He will not be long in getting acquainted. We shall count him one at least. May the Lord give him great success.

—o—

ISLAND CITY, OREGON.

P. M. Bell:—Since coming on my work we have been "tried as by fire." About two weeks before Thanksgiving day my wife was taken sick, but she did not give up until the day after Thanksgiving when she took her bed and for two weeks she was very sick. I was not able to be at my first senior meeting except long enough to assist in the Sacrament. On the night of Dec. 2nd she had a very severe attack and I thought she was dying. I sent for a good brother and sister and for two hours we worked hard, and were rewarded by seeing her recover from the attack. She is up now, but not very strong, and she is still under treatment Most of the time she was sick I had to do all the house work, besides waiting on her, several nights being up all night. But just as I was about to succumb to the strain I succeeded in hiring a girl who stayed with us two weeks Even though the strain was great I kept up my work, and was able to look after every interest. Through it all the Lord has sustained us, and wonderfully blessed us. It was the loving Father's hand that chastened.

You heard something of the condition of this work at conference, and when I came over here I found it had not been exaggerated, but the brethren rallied nobly at our call and came heartily to our help. There are yet difficulties to overcome, but many that seemed unsurmountable at first have melted away, and the old ship is getting out into the deep waters of God's love and grace, while the clouds over head are fast disappearing and a clear sky is being revealed. With the blessed Savior as our Pilot I think the old craft will avoid the "breakers;" and have a safe voyage this trip (year.)

Our congratulations have been good from the start and continue so. Just as soon as I arrived on the work I began praying, preaching and working for a revival, and I began a protracted meeting Jan. 1st which continues. There is deep interest manifested and we have had one conversion, a noble young lady. There are many persons attending our services who have never attended anywhere before, who, owing to the peculiar situation, have certain excuses to make, but the Spirit is working and I look for large results, if not now, then in the near future. I may close the meeting next Sunday or may continue a month, but when I close here I will begin another immediately at another of my appointments.

The stewards were quite liberal in fixing our salary at $500.00 and parsonage. Our finances to date are in fair condition and the prospect is quite good to meet them. Please send my "Methodist" to Island City, Oregon, instead of LaGrande at present.

P. M. Bell.

CHRIST AND THE POOR.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE PATH OF WEALTH."

This glad Christmas day brings good cheer to everybody, old and young, rich and poor, but it is especially a gladsome day to the poor, for in every Christian country their needs are carefully looked after during each recurring Christmas season. It is also the custom of those countries to give the inmates of their prisons and asylums right royal fare on Christmas day. This is the birthday of our Lord Jesus, and as His mission upon the earth was more especially to the poor and the outcasts of society, those who are endeavoring to follow in his footsteps, are reminded of their obligation to share their prosperity with those who are less favorably circumstanced. Christ is pre-eminently a friend of the poor. There are a great many things that can be said in favor of this proposition. From the beginning of His ministry and even prior to His birth, the information was heralded, that he was coming, or had come to the earth to bring gladness, peace and plenty, to the homes and the hearts of the poor. When God revealed through the Angel's visit to Mary and Elizabeth, that Christ the Lord was coming, it was made known to them that His mission was to be to the poor; that He was to bring food for the hungry, and light for those who were sitting in darkness. In prophetic utterance, hundreds of years before his birth, it was stated of him, that, He was to proclaim liberty to the captives, and to open the prison doors to them that were bound. In that wonderful outburst of holy eloquence, which sprang out of Mary's heart like sparkling water from an artezan well, on the occasion of her visit to Elizabeth, soon after the angel had revealed to her the fact, that she was to be the mother of her Lord, and in response to Elizabeth's congratulations, she said, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Savior..... He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away." This was the first utterance made concerning the mission of our Lord on the eve of his birth. God revealed to this holy woman, whom Jesus had chosen to be his mother, that his advent into the world was not to the rich, not to the learned, not to the kings and mighty men of earth, but to those who were sitting in darkness, and in the shadow of death; to those who were hungry, and in destitute circumstances. And each successive utterance concerning Jesus Christ, either from His own lips or from the lips of others, has been in harmony with this prophetic outburst of Mary his mother.

When John was born and the dumb tongue of Zacharias was unloosed, he too gave expression to similar sentiments, on the occasion of naming the babe, who was to be the forerunner of Jesus the Messiah.

This, too, was a prophetic utterance, full of rapture and holy inspiration, "And his father, Zacharias, was filled with the Holy Ghost and prophesied saying: Blessed be the Lord God of ISRAEL, FOR HE HATH VISITED AND REDEEMED HIS PEOPLE." And thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the Highest; for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways. To give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins. Through the tender mercy of our God, whereby the day spring from on high hath visited us. "To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace."

It seems that all who took part in conveying the glad news to earth, of the incarnation of our Lord, took special delight in emphasizing the fact that, His mission on earth was to the poor, and that it was a mission of gladness and liberty to men. Thus it was a part of the angel's song as they sang their glad carols over the fields of Bethlehem. They sang, "Glory to God in the Highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." On Christ's advent into the world, the many were in poverty while the few had riches and prosperity. Anything but peace prevailed, for the world was covered with the dark mantle of sadness and sighing. Jesus Christ like a mighty conqueror, was coming to drive back the curse of poverty and darkness and usher in a time of peace, plenty and prosperity, and thus the angel's sang of Him on His advent to the earth.

The surroundings, and the facts in connection with his birth, also indicate that he was to make the cause of the poor His own cause. Thus, he chose to be born amid the lowliest possible surroundings; no child, however poor, could be born upon a humbler couch or in a more disagreeable apartment, and as the angel's said, "This shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger." Then Jesus selected persons in humble circumstances to be his parents, and among whom He was to spend the most of his days in the flesh. In His early manhood He worked as a carpenter, so that He might know what it meant to earn His living with the sweat of His brow; that from experience He might know how to sympathize with the sons of toil.

Hence in after life, those who were in authority said derisively, "Is not this the carpenter, and are not His brethren with us?"

When he had to make selection of helpers to preaching His Gospel, he did not go to the halls of learning, to the homes of luxury, or to the palaces of kings to select them, but He made choice of humble fishermen, and cast in His lot, fully and unreservedly with those who were called the poor of this world.

Another singular fact, but wholly in harmony with his life work, is that His preaching and teaching were largely addressed to the humbler classes. When he would form special attachments they were not chosen from the rich, but from those who were in the humbler walks of life. The people who flocked to hear him, and who waited upon His ministry for the most part were the common people. Hence it was used against Him by the priests and his other enemies that He made Himself "the friend of publicans and sinners." No other prophet, or messenger from God, had ever so fully identified himself with the common people as Jesus Christ. When we consider the class distinctions of Oriental nations and remember how sharp the lines were drawn between the learned and illiterate, between the rich and poor, or the aristocracy and democracy, we can the more fully comprehend the love of Jesus for the poor, and the wonderful courage which enabled him to carry out his life's mission.

So thoroughly had Jesus indoctrinated His followers with the spirit of His mission to the poor, and so fully did the Holy Ghost bring to their remembrance His words and works that the early Church was pre-eminently a Church composed of the poor. Then, too, a special department of the Church was organized for the express purpose of ministering to the wants of widows and those who were in necessitous circumstances. This is the record of its organization, Acts vi. 1:4. "And in those days, when the number of the disciples were multiplied, there arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the daily ministration. Then the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and said. "It is not reason that we should leave the Word of God, and serve tables. Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business. But we will give ourselves continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word." Hence the origin of the diaconate was in the needs of the poor, and its special office was to minister to their necessities. Here is a clear case made out that the mission and work of Jesus Christ, was not only to preach the Gospel of salvation to the souls of men, but it is also addressed to the salvation of their bodies, from want and destitution. If the modern Church had been true to the Spirit of her master, and had followed in the footsteps of the early Church, the good work now being done, by the various benovlent societies, would have been a part of her work, and by thus caring for the bodies of the masses she would have multiplied her power a hundred fold in saving their souls. I would like to ask, where can we find in the modern Church anything which corresponds with this apostolic diaconate? This part of Christianity has been neglected, and it is being done outside of the auspices of the Church, and to a great extent outside of the spiritual influences of Christianity. It is an astounding thing, that the Church of Jesus Christ has no organization, whose mission is to relieve the needs of the poor; to look after the temporal wants of her members, to lend a helping hand in time of need, to Christians, or to have in any way any direct interest in the temporal prosperity of her membership. By the example and mission of Jesus, by the spirit of His Gospel, by the example of the early Church, it is clearly the duty of the Christian Church not only to be a theoretical friend of the poor, but practically to organize, so as to help them with material, as well as spiritual blessings. How much better it would be if the time spent in the club room were spent in the Church, and if the provision made against sickness and death, could be received from the organized Church of God.

I have to remark in the next place, that the religion of Jesus Christ aims to banish poverty. While Jesus is a friend to the poor, He is an enemy to poverty. There is no virtue in being poor any more than there is in being sick, or being possessed of any other weakness. The love that Jesus has for the poor, is not a love of admiration, or of reward, but a love of compassion. Poverty is one of the results of sin, and Jesus Christ came to institute a philosophy, and a rule of life which will banish poverty. The relief of the immediate physical needs of the poor, is given to prevent suffering and to prepare the heart and mind for the reception of principles, which if followed, will remove the subject from the ranks of poverty, and place him in the ranks of comfort. There may be loyal followers of Jesus Christ who are poor in this world's goods, but the number is small, and they must of necessity be the exception and not the rule. Christianity is an effectual weapon against poverty to the individual as well as to the Nation. Any man who will comport himself according to Christian doctrine, and will be rue to its principles cannot long stay in the ranks of poverty; any more than darkness can hold sway where the light is shining. Christianity is the antipodes of poverty, for "Godliness is profitable unto all things having the promise of the life that now is."

Hence, while on the one hand Christ is a friend to the poor, he is the enemy of poverty; and the object of his friendship is for the purpose of making them rich. "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich." And thus while on this glad Christmas day the hearts of Christian people go out in sympathy to the poor, and they help them to material good, for their immediate necessities, they can also offer them peace, plenty and happiness, for all time to come.

EDITORIAL.

THE SINFULNESS OF SIN.

—o—

One great source of trouble at the present day is the failure of men to realize the sinfulness of sin. Their minds are blinded by the god of this world. Their foolish hearts are darkened. They are so given up to the pursuits of life in its coarser, material conditions that their perceptions of spiritual truths are blunted. They may possess a kind of principle of honor among them in their relations to each other, much like the "code" among dualists, or the "Queensbury rules" among pugilists—a disposition to give every fellow a fighting chance for his life while an effort is made to knock him out if possible. Yet there is a great disregard of the claims of the higher spiritual law of God upon the heart and conscience. They have no "conscience for sins." They are dead in tresspasses and in sins. They wink at sin, roll it as a sweet morsel under the tongue, think it smart to commit it and clever to conceal it, if indeed they care at all for the latter. This spirit, that worketh in the children of disobedience, infects the very atmosphere in which we live. A preacher friend of ours once told us of the distress he felt because apparently he could not have the abhorrence for a certain kind of sin that it really deserved. We have to be on our guard and keep our heart with all diligence lest we catch the contagion. Recently [illegible] minister instructing [illegible] erning the process [illegible] was just after an [illegible] ade by another [illegible] importance of [illegible]. He wanted to ma[illegible] easy, and told them [illegible]d be Christians [illegible] easiness and inwa[illegible] they had heard abo[illegible]s. "Just resolve in t[illegible] be Christians, and t[illegible] version." We could not [illegible] ing our brother against [illegible] ger of such counsel. M[illegible] need much encouragem[illegible] this kind at this point.. [illegible] ust not heal lightly the h[illegible] he daughter of God's people[illegible]e must not be guilty of crying "peace, peace," when there is no peace—when sin unconfessed and unrepented rules in the heart. The proud Pharisee experienced no distress when he went into the temple, while the poor Publican was greatly troubled, stood afar off, smote upon his breast, would not even look toward heaven and cried,' "God be merciful to me a sinner." The latter, says our Lord, went to his house justified rather than the former. David was in great agony because of his sin. He was as one in a horrible fit, sinking in deep mire, and as one who had been smitten of God and all his bones broken. He cried mightily to God for pardon, for a clean heart, a right spirit and the joy of God's salvation which alone would fit him to teach transgressors and see sinners converted to God. Paul was doubtless passing through the same deep waters when it was said, "Behold he prayeth," and when he cried, "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Sin to him was a powerful force, a fearful reality, and, having tasted of its bitter cup, and felt the sting of its galling yoke, he never ceased with entreaties and tears to warn men against it, commending the truth to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

In proportion as we hate sin we will love righteousness. As we abhor that which is evil we will cleave to that which is good. And why not hate it and abhor it? What in all the universe of God so wicked, so loathesome, so vile? We talk of the sin of the anarchists in our government, and believe in visiting swift justice upon them, because they would do away with law and spread destruction everywhere. Every sinner is an anarchist in the government of God, and had he the power would produce the same result in the spiritual and moral measure. We laugh at the folly of the anarchist in trying to resist a strong government like ours; but the folly of every sinner is still greater, for it is only a question of time when his way will be hedged about and he will be cast into utter darkness. We have a perfect horror of the cholera and our government moves all the forces of earth and heaven at its command to quarantine against it, yet at the same time we harbor a thousand evils, such as lust, covetousness, gambling, Sabbath desecration, profanity, drunkenness and the liquor traffic, which destroy more people, body and soul, in one year than were ever affected with cholera since the landing of Columbus. The disobedient child that breaks a fond mother's heart by such ingratitude is styled a heartless wretch; yet who has not committed the same offense against a loving Heavenly Father? The great apostle has shown us in the seventh chapter of Romans that by the law is the knowledge of sin, and the commandment came that sin might appear exceeding sinful.

Truthfully and forcibly has it been said by Burkett in his notes upon this passage: From hence it follows that sin is therefore exceeding, yea unmeasurably sinful, poisonous and pernicious, because it kills men; and not only so, but it kills men by that which is good, to-wit: the law. That which was appointed for life becomes the occasion of death; consequently sin is the most villainous, virulent and deadly thing, that ever was in the world. Ah! sinful sin, hyperbolically and out of measure sinful, thou art a contempt of God's sovereign authority, a contrariety to his infinite holiness, a violation of his royal and righteous law, and the highest affront that can be offered to the majesty of the great and glorious God. Thou hast made man like a beast, like the worst of beasts, yea, sin is worse than the devil himself, than hell itself. Sin made the devil what he is. A devil and hell never had an existence till sin had one. God was never angry till sin made him angry. O sin! 'tis thou that makest hell to be hell; and the more sin the more hell. Well might the apostle then say here, "Sin that it might appear sin, worketh death in me, and is becoming exceeding sinful."

—o—

We do not have to be great in anything except faith to obtain great favor with God

HERE AND THERE.

Ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes died at his home at Fremont, Ohio, January 17th, 1893. While the circumstances under which the deceased was elevated to the presidency were very trying and such as to provoke bitterness and unpleasant criticism, yet in all pobability most men would have followed the dictates of party leaders just as he did. While he was not regarded as one of the most brilliant men, yet he possessed many excellent traits. His administration was characterized as just and impartial. He possessed a kindly nature, and won the respect of his political opponents.

The Montana legislature is having quite a time in the election of a Senator to succeed Mr. Sanders. The Democrats have a majority, counting the three Populist members, who are voting with them, but they cannot unite on a man. Mr. W. A. Clark, of Butte, has a decided majority of the Democratic votes, while the others are divided between W. W. Dixon and T. E. Collins. The Republicans vote solidly for Sanders. This thing of politics is an uncertain business. At this writing no one knows which way the cat will hop.

The weather in Western Montana is the finest in the memory of the oldest inhabitant, at this season of the year. The skies are like those of Italy, while the gentle zephyrs seem as soft and spicy as those we sing about on Ceylon's isle. We would advise our friends in such snowy and frozen regions as Missouri and Mississippi are reported to be, to emigrate to a warmer climate—Montana.

Dr. L. A. Steel, pastor at McKendree church, Nashville, has recently married. He and his bride have our best wishes for present and future happiness. The doctor has recently written some trenchant articles upon the subject of holiness. Would that we had space for the one that appeared in the "Southern Christian Advocate." Holiness is the great need of the church to-day.

The apostle says, "If ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sons." Those professors of religion, whose spiritual state gives them no concern, have cause to examine the ground of their hope in Christ. Woe to them that are at ease in Zion.

Brother, what have you done towards the support of your preacher this year? Would he not have starved out if all had treated him as you have? It is time to begin to divide up the good things that God has blessed you with. Pay that thou owest.

A number of errors occurred in the columns of our issue, January 13th. In our editorial on education, speaking of the dislike begotten for manual labor, we wrote, "which they have come to regard as beneath their dignity". The types made us say, "have cause to regard," etc. In speaking of the palatial home of our Brother and Sister Clarke at Helena, the typesetter made us say, "political home" As we cannot read the proof, and our manuscript, like lawyer's writing, "ain't no print," it is impossible to prevent errors. Our readers will please make allowance.

ENCOURAGING WORDS.

Mrs. G. W. Shoemaker writes from Sheridan, Montana: Enclosed find three dollars for back pay and one more year's subscription in advance. Excuse my long neglect, but it is better late than never. We have a good Sunday-school at Sheridan, and also a Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and preaching every two weeks. The evil of intemperance seems to counter balance all the good. But we are striving hard to overthrow it. Pray for our success.

Joe Rosell, Florida, Mo.: Enclosed find $1 for the "Montana Methodist." We like it very much. We are having some mighty cold weather now, Jan. 13.

Our good brother, Rev. W. R. Cain, writing from Falls City, Neb., in December, renews and sends a new subscriber and says: I am glad that you have concluded to talk to us once a week. I do hope and pray that the "Methodist" will be a success as a weekly paper. God bless the paper and God bless the Montana Conference and make you a thousand fold more than you now are.

We are having good winter weather—snow 12 or 14 inches deep and mercury down to zero.

The only people who can be lost are those who will not decide to be saved now.

COMMUNICATIONS.

NORTHERN METHODISTS IN TENNESSEE.

By A. C. Couey.

Editor "Montana Methodist:—The caption above is one feature of a rather hackneyed subject as we all know, but having labored side by side with our Northern brethren in Montana, and knowing their sentiments toward the Southern Methodists, their estimate of the demands for our presence as a church, etc., I beg the privilege of a little chapter from my own personal observations on the above subject. Please have it understood that this is not "car window observation, nor second hand from negro porters, nor from prejudiced white folks.

IN CHATTANOOGA.

On my return from North Georgia last fall, I had several hours in this beautiful city of the mountains, forming the southern gateway to Tennessee. I put the time in as best I could. Among the places visited was the "U. S. Grant University." This building and grounds have a most prominent, commanding situation, on one of the very choicest streets of the city, and is as they say in the "Announcement for 1892-3," "all that could be desired." After looking at the grounds and the exterior of the building, which together are said to have cost $200,000, I went within and was cordially received in the office of Prof. Hooper, who is the principal. This reception was by his good lady, Mrs. Hooper, to whom I handed my card from "Montana." Making known my desire to "do" the University, she kindly took me from cellar to garret, from the laundry to the chapel. To my many questions, as many indefinite answers were made. I will not venture the reason of this indefiniteness, but would say the most charitable opinion, was that the dear good sister did not know.

Such became the embarrassment that she proposed to conduct me to Prof. Hooper's classroom, that I might interview him. This was done. After an introduction, I plied Prof. Hooper with a list of questions for general information concerning this University. From both Mrs. Hooper, and the principal, Prof. Hooper, I got the following: Boarders, about 40 or 50, day pupils from the city, a fraction less. Total in attendance less than 100; number in faculty I did not learn. Course of study—that which is embraced in the preparatory department and what would properly fall under an Academy course, and as well as I could gather, less than is given in the High Schools of Butte City. In addition to the above, Mrs. Hooper told me they had several (indefinite,) theological students; but that this department was not thoroughly organized. To sum up: This U. S. University has about half the pupils of "The Webb Bros.' School", at Bellbuckle, Tenn., but does not begin to touch its curriculum. The above are the facts as nearly as I could learn by diligent inquiry. On leaving I asked for a catalogue. I quote the "Announcement for 1892-3," page 5.

Chattanooga, the seat of the professional schools, medicine, pharmacy, dentistry, law, theology, technology and business college, and academic, normal, music and art departments, etc." Now, sir, between what really is, and what you would think from the "Announcement" there is a great chasm, difficult to span, without "enlargement on the truth." "Except the Lord build the house," etc. The truth of the whole matter is, they are making a miserable failure with that institution which they try to dignify with the high sounding title of University. We do not think that we do them any injustice to say that this is a "clap-trap method" by which to "draw" the unwary. I may give you another short chapter on this line at another time concerning their unwisdom at McMinnville and at Nashville. To point the moral: If our dear good Northern brethren are distressed about the waste of men and money by the Southern Methodists in Montana, why on earth can they not weep a little bit over their own folly. Our presence in Montana, or anywhere else West, is not the equivalent to their presence in Tennessee. When they can do for Montana what Southern Methodists are doing for Tennessee, then their present views may have the semblance of reason. Greetings to my former fellow-laborers.

OBITUARY.

Hensley—In Deer Lodge, Montana, Monday, January 2d, 1893, William A. Hensley, aged 58 years.

William A. Hensley, the subject of this sketch, was born in Scott county, Kentucky, April 30, 1835, and departed this life at his home in Deer Lodge, Montana, January 2, 1893, at 7 p. m.

For several months Mr. Hensley had been afflicted with a form of paralysis, which with some complications grew worse and worse until, in spite of the best medical skill and all that kind hands could do, his strong constitution yieded and he quietly passed away in the midst of his family and friends. He leaves a wife and eight children to mourn their loss, besides a great many friends who feel personally bereaved in his death.

His surroundings in early life were of the kind to develop in him those sturdy traits of character that always made him "a man among men." In his early manhood he came from his Kentucky home and taught school in Missouri and Texas. At the close of the war he came west and settled in Montana, engaging in mining at first and later in ranching and stock-raising, accumulating a good competency of property and making a record for honesty, sobriety and purity when such virtues were rare in this altitude.

In 1868 he married Lovina Hancock of Carroll county, Mo., and brought her to this country to share the cares and trials and victories of life with him; and to them was born the six sons and two daughters, nearly all of whom are grown and beginning to take a honorable places in the community.

W. A. Hensley was a generous, great-hearted man, who never suffered the hungry to go unfed from his door, or allowed anyone to suffer when he could alleviate pain. His intrinsic politeness was proverbial, and even when near the end, but permitted to sit up that he might breathe easier, he would rise or try to do so, to give a seat to a visitor, or remove his swollen feet out of the chair to let one coming in sit down.

The characteristic grasp of the hand was true to the last. But above all the man of a Christian faith; the son of a Methodist minister he accepted Christ as his Savior in early life, and while he did not live up to his duty and privilege, he never entirely slackened his hold and some months before his demise he was formally received into the church and partook of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper with his wife and friends.

NEHEMIAH'S PRAYER.

Lesson Text, Neh. I. 1-11.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Lord, be thou my helper.—Ps. xxx. 10.

TEACHING HINTS.

BY A. F. SCHAUFFLER, D. D.

Let the teacher remember that there were three "returns" of the Jews from captivity. One under Zerubbabel. Their chief work was the rebuilding of the temple. One under Ezra, and their chief work was the return to a stricter keeping of the law of Moses. And one under Nehemiah, and this time the chief work was the rebuilding of the walls of the city. The prayer that we study to-day was offered in captivity by Nehemiah, about ninety years after the first return under Zerubbabel. Bear well in mind the situation of affairs at this time. The temple was indeed finished; but the walls of the city were still in a mass of ruins, and the people therefore defenseless against their enemies. It is hard for children of this day to understand what a wall was to an ancient city; but they should be told that it was all in all, and a wall-less city was in mockery and derision.

All this time, far away in the land of captivity, lived Nehemiah, who by reason of his fidelity had been promoted to be cupbearer to the king. His position was one of great comfort, not to say affluence; for he lived in the palace, and had all that he needed for his bodily wants. Many men would have been content with this condition of affairs, and would have given little thought to the affairs of those who were so far away. Or, if he cared for them, it would have been in the way in which most people in our day care for the poor, by saying, "It is too bad, I am so sorry for them." But Nehemiah was not that kind of a man. His thought about Jerusalem, and longed for its welfare, so that it lay a trifle nearer his heart than any other earthly thing. When men from there came to his city, his first question was concerning the children of the captivity, and he inquired how it fared with them. Thus it came to pass that he heard from Hanani the evil tidings, which led his heart to mourn and his lips to pray. This prayer of his forms a large part of our lesson for to-day, and as it is a kind of model for all who pray in earnest, we may well study it.

1. IT WAS A STEADFAST PRAYER.

He did not pray for once, or twice, and then stop, he prayed on and on. For how long? For not less than four months. And this prayer was intermingled with fasting as well. This showed his intensity of desire. Though there was no sign during all these months of any answer that we know of, he never stopped, but kept up his supplication, assured that in his own time God would give him his desire, if it was for the best.

2. IT WAS A PENITENT PRAYER.

Read verses 6 and 7. He fully realized that God was not to blame for the condition of affairs that made him so sad. It was because the people had sinned, and his own forefathers among them, that all this evil had come upon them. If they had only obeyed the commandments of the Lord their God, captivity would never have been their lot, nor would they ever had to rebuild temple or walls. So he confessed the sins of his people, and his own sins as well, and begged for pardon and Grace from God.

3. IT WAS PRAYER FOR PERSONAL WORK.

This is apparent from the fact that he prayed for grace "in the sight of this man." That meant that God should so incline the heart of the king that he would permit Nehemiah to go up to Jerusalem himself, and help those that were in such distress. Of course he knew that he was not asking for a bed of roses to lie on when he wished to go to that afflicted city. But his heart's desire was that the walls might go up, and in that arduous work he craved a part, however difficult it might be. This is grand. Many people pray, "Thy kindom come," but they want it to come through the self-sacrifices of others, and the suffering of others, and are not willing to make any painful effort themselves to help on the answer to their prayers. Of one thing you may be quite sure. If you pray for anything, and are not willing to do anything to bring your prayer to pass, God will not put himself out much to help you. He who prays for a thing should want it so much that he is willing to do anything in reason to reach the fulfillment of his desire. Then he is likely to have his prayer answered.

4. HE PLEADED GOD'S PROMISES.

See verse 8 and 9. If God makes a promise, we may be sure that he will keep it, as soon as we comply with the conditions that he lays down. Nehemiah knew this, and so he dared to remind God of what he had said to Moses and the children of Israel many years before this. He "brought forth his reasons," and they were good ones. In this he set us a good example. When you go to God to ask for anything, have you any promise that he will give it to you? Then plead that promise, and see if he will not be faithful to it. But there are many who pray and yet be at a loss to quote a single passage of God's which they could use as an argument in their prayers. How they differ from this man in his captivity!

5. HE KEPT ON PRAYING, IN SPITE OF DIFFICULTIES.

Of these there were many. Had his desires been languid, or his faith weak, they would have been quite sufficient to lead him to stop praying after a few days. In the first place there was the king. He wanted such a man as Nehemiah near him, for he was one of the few whom he could really trust. In fact, the life of the king was in Nehemiah's hands, for was he not the king's cupbearer? And was not that office created just on purpose to protect the life of the king from poison? And would he be likely to let this peculiarly valuable man go away from his court? Second, there was the long journey; much longer, relatively, than a journey around the world in our times. And it was not a luxurious experience, like that of traveling in a Pullman car to-day. Third, there was need of many things to be given by the king before they would be able to undertake so great a work as rebuilding of the walls of the city. But, in spite of all these difficulties, Nehemiah kept on praying. As the Psalmist said, so could he say, "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after." So Paul said in later times, "One thing I do." In all this, the captive of twenty-five hundred years ago set a grand example to us in these later days as to how to pray, in what spirit to pray, and how long to pray. Are you following that example?—S. S. Times.

A CASE IN POINT.

Here is a striking illustration of the last sentence of the paragraph above. Last fall a young minister was sent to a small town in a northwestern conference. There were several mills in the place in which from seventy-five to a hundred young men were employed. Most of the young fellows had come from other parts and had no regular home in the village. There were twenty saloons and several billiard parlors. In these dens the men spent most of their evenings. They paid over their money freely, and were treated with marked cordiality by the several saloonists and their employes. Did this not show thoroughly depraved tastes on the part of the young men? Probably so. But you must remember that they were far from home, and that no other doors in town swung open to their touch. One young minister had been in town only a few weeks before he fully took in the situation. Then he planned a solution of the problem. The church was located on the main street, and had a basement which had for some years remained unused. The sewage was imperfect, and the social services had been moved up stairs. Into this basement the minister went with carpenter, painter, and paper-hanger, and it was soon transformed into a clean, attractive room. Tables and chairs were borrowed, and some inexpensive appliances for gymnastic exercises set up. A number of daily papers were subscribed for. The best magazines found their way to the table. Some innocent games were introduced. An invitation was given all young men to make the basement their headquarters every evening. About forty accepted. The evenings passed pleasantly in reading, conversation, and gymnastic practice until it became the most popular resort in town. The young minister often spent an evening with his new friends, and strong personal attachments were formed. The saloon-keepers were robbed of much of their trade. They raved. They threatened. They tried to break up "that church club," as they sneeringly called it. Toward spring our young minister held revival services. Among the first to present themselves as seekers after Christ were two of the young men whose hearts had been so adroitly won. When the service closed he received eighteen of them into the church.

This is not fiction. It is history. Did the experiment pay? What minister could win a more signal triumph? The greatness of the victory does not now appear, nor will it for ages to come. These eighteen redeemed lives will touch other lives, and literal multitudes will be lifted up through influences which shall project through the years.—Epworth Herald.

The Best Words.

A loving word is always a safe word. It may, or it may not, be a helpful word to the one who hears it, but it is sure to be a pleasant memory to the one who speaks it. Many a word spoken by us is afterwards regretted; but no word of affectionate appreciation to which we have given utterance finds a place among our sadly remembered expressions. Looking back over our intercourse with a dead friend or fellow-worker, we may, indeed, regret that we were ever betrayed into a harsh, or hasty, or unloving word of censure or criticism in that intercourse; and we may wish vainly that we had now the privilege of saying all the loving words that we might honestly have spoken while he was yet with us. But there will never come into our hearts at such a time a single pang of regret over any word of impulsive or deliberate affection which passed our lips at any time. We have reason to be on our guard in our speech in most directions; but we can be fearlessly free in our loving utterances. Apart from any question of the good we do to others by our words of love, we are personally the gainers, for now and for hereafter, by every such work which we speak out explicitly; and we are sure to be the losers; now and by and by, from every such word which we ought to have spoken and failed to speak.—Sunday-School Times.

News From The Front.

LELAND, IDAHO.

W. S. Hornbuckle, P. C.: We are having a good meeting at Leland in our church. God is stirring the community for miles around, and the devil is mad. One bright conversion last night. Six accessions up to date, and more to follow. Pray for us.

HELENA DISTRICT.

By J. E. Squires.

Deer Lodge, Mont., Jan. 18. '93.

My dear brother:— I am sorry you passed through my ground, and so near to me, and that I did not get the grip of your hand. Your weekly paper keeps you busy I suppose, and I am sure it will please the subscribers better than the semi-monthly. I trust we may circulate it enough to put it in the best financial condition. I have seen or heard from all of our men in the conference quite lately. Bros. Bramble and Flowers are away visiting their wife's people. Bro. Lee has lost his little boy and has the prayers and sympathy of all his brethren. Bros. Warren, Alton, Clark and Waggener are in revival meetings on their respective charges. Others of the brethren are helping these. Britt with Alton, Tabor with Warren Schaffer with Waggener, and your humble servant with Bro. Clark. Our Brother Noland is at work at Wallace, and I think will command that strategic point for our church. Bro. Goulder is moving well at Willow Creek, and has now with him our young brother Glasgow, who comes up from Bozeman for license at our next quarterly meeting there. Now I want here to state that our district conference is to be held at this place, and will convene about the last of March, date given later. I have asked Bishop Haygood to be present and we hope to have him. I expect to have a definite work assigned to each member of the conference, and we hope to magnify the occasion by having lively discussions on the most practical themes hope to publish the program soon in your paper. I subjoin the quarterly conference appointments for Helena District, 3d round.

FROM ISLAND CITY, ORE.

Jan. 16th, 1893.

Mr. Editor:—In your last issue of the "Methodist" you urged us to write while the battle was in progress. I intended to wait, but will not do so after that request.

Yes erday was a glorious time for us at Mass Chapel. At them orning service I received six into the church; five on profession of faith and one by vows. Three of them are noble young ladies and three others young girls about 13 years old. A very large congregation was present, and many eyes were wet with tears as hearts were touched, and souls felt the thrill of the presence of God. There are many more deeply convicted, but as yet have not yielded. The meeting has been in progress two weeks and will continue this week, perhaps longer. I have no ministerial help, but am assisted by my wife and others in the singing. Pray for us as I know you do. May the Lord continue to bless the "Methodist" and its editor.

P. M. Bell.

(My wife is about recovered).

—o—

FROM CIRCLEVILLE, KAS.

Mr. Editor:—Your little paper now comes to our home every week. It is small in size, but large in its make-up of matter. It gets better all the time. I hear it spoken of in the highest terms by all who read it. It is filled with just such matter as is interesting and helpful to the average reader. It is like the preacher's sermon—short but sweet.

We are having very cold weather. The ground has been covered with snow six or eight inches deep for over a month, though stock is doing very well. The corn crop turned out much better than was expected. A great many cattle and hogs are being fed, more than have been for several years previous, though times are hard and money matters close. But we hope for better times.

Our preachers, so far as I can learn, are doing the best they can under the circumstances. Our preacher, Brother Tillery, is like Bishop Marvin said of old Brother John Monroe at the conference at Kansas City in 1867. "He is just as good a man as he knows how to be, and he knows how very well." Brother Edwin Tull, who is on the circuit with Brother Tillery, is a nice young man and preaches very well for his practice. You all know Rev. T. C. Downs, our presiding elder. There is no discount on him. As Dr. McAnally once said, "he will do to hitch to."

I spoke of the hard times we are having. I suppose we will surely have better times now, as we have a new president and a new people's party governor of our state. When I was a boy I once heard one of my brothers, who was a Democrat, and old Cash Williams, a very strong whig, talking about the hard times we were then having. It was just after the election of old General Harrison. If a man got twenty-five cents for a day's work he was doing well and everything else was in proportion. It seemed that there was hardly any money in the country. Finally Williams remarked, "Well, Stanley, I am afraid there is not enough money in the country to last until Harrison can send it on." It seemed that the old man thought that Harrison would just send money on by the cart-load and distribute it all over the United States. So, I presume now our new president and our new governor, judging by what the politicians have told us, will send us all the money we need before very long.

Henry Stanley.

FROM POMEROY, WASH.

Pomeroy, Wash., Jan. 3rd, '93.

Dear Brother Stanley:—I am taking your paper and receive it every week. I am better pleased with it since it became a weekly than before, and I thought it good then. We live in a thinly settled country and have scarcely any preaching. Brother Gibbs has preached once for us and we enjoyed the sermon very much. But Brother Gibbs, you know, has a circuit large enough for four ministers, if the country was settled up thicker. He has to be on the fly to get around to his appointments and visit the people, which he does. (Thank the Lord for that—Editor.) He is holding a meeting at Paola, but we have not heard the results. We have Sunday School about half the year. We try to do what little we can. (We are glad of that. We know some of the discouragements and trials of living in a new and thinly settled country. We have been there, and received our first training in Christian work under just such circumstances. Be faithful, sister, and while doing the little things you may accomplish great things in the end—Editor.) It seems to me that the people ought to be stirred when so many are going down to ruin. There are many that have been raised to do right that have been led off and lost. Nothing but the grace of God can save such. O, may his saving power be manifested in our midst.

Sophia J. Moyer.

FROM WHITEHALL.

Mr. Editor:—Enclosed find five dollars to be applied to the payment of the missionary debt, the amount assumed by our conference last fall. I regret that we have not more to send you. As Montana was the first conference to lead off in the proposed plan of liquidating the heavy debt hanging over our church, I hope we will be the first to pay the amount assumed. (Let all who subscribed say amen, and send us the money at once, and let as many more who did not subscribe do the same—Editor).

I was detained in Butte City on Friday and Saturday the 16th and 17 ult., as a witness in a mineral land, case, until after the train for Whitehall had left. Sunday morning I availed myself of the pleasure and profit of hearing Brother Alton preach a splendid sermon. His text may be found in Numbers, 10th chapter and 29th verse: "And Moses said unto Hobab. . . . We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord hath said, I will give it you; come thou with us and we will do thee good."

At the close of Brother Alton's sermon, which I think hard to improve, I took the afternoon train and arrived home in time to hear Brother Goulder preach a good sermon from Mark, 4th chapter and 37th to 39th verses, "And there a rose a great storm of wind," etc. Brother Goulder has evidently made good use of his time since he preached on this circuit four years ago.

WORLDLINESS IN THE CHURCH.

Mr. Editor:—After wife and the wee one recovered I find myself almost helpless again with rheumatism. Just how it will terminate I cannot tell. I hope it will not keep me from my beloved employ. We have not held special services yet, but will begin soon. The indications are very good now. Our church seems to grow in favor with the people all the while.

I do not know how it is up with you, Mr. Editor, but there is so much worldliness in the church in this section that it seems to be sapping the life out of the church. So many there are who have a name to live and are dead while they live. So many who are satisfied with their name on the church register. I have been useing some sledge hammer blows in that direction, and at that point. When I read the Savior's denunciation against this particular sin it makes me tremble to see how silent we have been in the past. Certainly God will hold us responsible for not crying aloud against this sin as well as any other. Our blessed Lord never did denounce the poor drunkard, nor the leper, nor even blind Bartemeus, nor the woman taken in adultery, but he drove with tremendous force the arrow pointed at covetousness.

Then how can we afford to do less and be true to Him who has commissioned us and sent us out to cast a light upon this darkened world? I hope he will spare me to continue to lift my warning voice against this dreadful sin so common among our church members. Some who never go to church on the Sabbath, to say nothing of the prayer-meeting and other social meetings of the church, are the ones who want the preacher to count the world and bait the church with a little flesh to catch men.

What a pity! O, how we need a revival of the ministry of the axes! A John the Baptist or a Luther to preach against these sinners regardless of their position in the church or State, or their pocket books. We are glad to welcome our new transfers to our conference, while we regret to give up any one.

God bless you and the "Methodist". Send mine to Leland, Idaho.

W. S. Hornbuckle.

THE BITTER ROOT NURSERY.

We take pleasure in calling attention to the advertisement of Mr. Thos. Burrough, nurseryman, in another column. He is our neighbor and is honest and reliable. We think that he can do better by customers in Montana who wish to set out shrubbery, shade or fruit trees than those nursery men who sell by agents and have to ship their trees such a long distance. Let our friends who wish to beautify their homes or set out an orchard send one cent and get his price list.

A REMINISCENCE.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—Your reminiscence in a late number of the "Montana Methodist," of the Waterville circuit, calls up many events of the dead past. Some of these events are pleasant to look back upon, others are not so. In 1860, the "Big Blue Mission" embraced all of northwestern Kansas, west of Circleville, and of course it embraced all the territory in the vicinity of Waterville. As Big Blue Mission was my first pastoral charge everything in connection with that country, as it then was, is indelibly fixed in my mind. The circuit extended from the Kansas River on the south to the Nebraska line on the north, and from Soldier Creek on the east to the Republican River on the West. One of my appointments was at the home of Sister Hamilton, who lived near Blue Rapids and not far from the present town of Waterville. Sister Hamilton lived in a cabin, but her presence made it a palace. You must remember, that we had neither church nor school-house in all that country at the time of which I write, and our only show was to preach in cabins or in groves. I have seen this cabin so filled with people that my only chance for a pulpit was to stand at the back of a chair. Some of the richest experiences of my life, are in connection with this cabin work. It sends a glow over my soul now, as I call up the seasons of grace and power manifested on these precious occasions, in the days that are past and gone.

In a grove on the very banks of the Blue River, we held one of the best meetings I have ever enjoyed. This was in August, 1861, Rev. P. W. Duncan, who is now a worthy local preacher in our church, was my colleague, and assisted in the meeting. The Holy Ghost fell upon the congregation, and many found the Lord. Bro. Hamilton was converted at this time, and many others who have long since gone to their reward.

In this same grove in 1862, we had an experience of a different kind. We had gone out to assist in a meeting held by Rev. J. O. Foresman, and Rev. P. W. Duncan, and the meeting was progressing nicely. On Sunday afternoon as we were trying to preach, a United States officer, with his squad, came into the congregation, Land while the soldiers stood at our side and held over us the flag of our country, the man with the shoulder straps sat just before us and busied himself writing. The very moment we ceased talking, the man in uniform approached us and handed us the note he had written, which read as follows: "Rev. Mr. King, Dear Sir, You are hereby requested to pray for Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, for the supression of the rebellion, and the success of the Federal armies." We told him plainly that if the soldiers desired us to pray for them, we would gladly do so, if they would make a personal request, and that we should be more than glad to pray for Mr. Lincoln on the same conditions, but to offer a dictated prayer to Almighty God we never would. We fully expected that our stubbornness would put us in durance vile, but after laughing at our folly, he permitted us to go on our way rejoicing. It did not take long for three Methodist preachers to saddle up and get from there. We crossed the Blue River at Blue Rapids and headed for Fancy Creek, passing over the ground where Waterville now stands, we did not let up until we reached the hospitable home of Bro. John Randolph.

We did not visit that part of the country again until 1870. It was in this year that the Western Conference was organized, at which time we were appointed to the Atchison district, which of course embraced all the territory above alluded to. It was during this year that the Waterville Church, to which you refer, was completed, and while we were on this district, we had the very great pleasure of dedicating it to the worship of Almighty God. Bro. P. R. King, Bro. Cox, and Sister Hamilton, together with many others, were present on that occasion. Most of those dear friends sleep now, but in the day that has "no night" they shall awake in His likeness. May you and I be there.

Joseph King.

Half-conscious Duty.

Professor Drummond tells the following story in the illustration of a sense of duty: "There was in Glasgow a boy apprentice to a telegraph lineman who told me this himself. One day this boy was up on the top of a four-story house with a number of men fixing up a telegraph wire. The work was all but done. It was getting late, and the men said they were going away home, and the boy was to nip off the ends of the wire. Before going down they told him to be sure and go back to the work-shop when he had finished, with his master's tools. The boy climbed up the pole, and began to nip off the ends of the wire. He lost his hold and fell upon the slates, and slid down, and then over in the air down almost to the ground. A clothes-rope stretched across the "green" caught him on the chest and broke his fall; but the shock was terrible, and he lay unconscious among some clothes upon the green. An old woman came out; seeing her rope broken, and the clothes all soiled, she thought the boy was drunk, shook him, scolded him, and went for a policeman. And the boy with the shaking came back to consciousness, rubbed his eyes, and got upon his feet. What do you think he did? He staggered, half blind, up the ladder. He got on the roof of the house. He gathered up his tools, put them into his basket, took them down, and when he got to the ground, fainted dead away. Just then the policeman came, saw there was something wrong, and carried him away to the infirmary, where he lay for some time. I am glad to say he got better, and is now doing well. What was his first thought at that terrible moment? His duty. He was not thinking of himself; he was thinking about his master. That is what the Christian ought to do."

Light in Darkness.

The fire burns low, the shadows gleam and fade,
And darkness lingers where the sunset played;
A hand of silence on my lips is laid—
I cannot find the light.

The eager longing fills my clouded breast;
I wait the coming of a heavenly guest;
Thou who of old in Bethany didst rest,
Tarry with me to-night.

With goodly fare my table is not spread,
Hot tears have mingled with my wine and bread;
I cannot pour upon thy blessed head
The spikenard rare and sweet.

But if my few poor gifts Thou condescend
To take, Thy taking worthiness will lend,
And I will pour my soul out, O my Friend!
Like Mary at Thy feet.

I strain my gaze now for one gleaming star,
I sit in darkness with my door ajar,
That I may hear Thy footsteps from afar,
The footsteps of my King!

And I do hear, though clouds Thy visage hide;
I reach my hand out thro' the shadowy tide
Of doubts and fears, and on the other side,
Lo! it is clasped in Thine!

I shuddering, feel the nail prints in the palm;
But O, the wounds drop healing, and a balm
Of tenderness that blesses with a calm
Of peace and love divine.

—Mary Lowe Dickinson, in "The Silver Cross."

The Story of a Hymn.

More than half a century ago a young girl was praparing for a grand ball to be given in her native town. Full of gay anticipation, she started out one day to her dressmaker, to have her a fine dress fitted for the occasion. On her way she met her pastor, an earnest, faithful man, and in the greeting that passed between them he learned her errand. He reasoned aud expostulated, and finally pleaded with her to stay away from the ball. Greatly vexed, she answered, "I wish you would mind your own business!" and went on her wayward course.

In due time the ball came off; and this young girl was the gayest of the gay. She was flattered and caressed; but after dancing all night, laying her weary head upon her pillow only with the returning light, she was far from happy. In all the pleasures there had been a thorn, and now conscience made her wretched. The pastor had always been a loving, and cherished friend, and her rudeness to him rankled in her breast. More than all, the truth of his words came to her heart, and would give her no rest. After three days of misery, during which life grew almost insupportable, she went to the minister with her trouble, saying:

"For three days I have been the most wretched girl in the world, and now, Oh that I were a Christian, I want to be happy. What must I do?"

We need not be told that the pastor freely forgave her for rudeness to himself, nor that he joyfully direted her to the true source of peace.

"Just give yourself, my child, to the Lamb of God, just as you are." This was a new gospel to her; she had never comprehended it before.

"What! Just as I am?" she asked. "Do you know I am one of the worst sinners in the world? How can he accept me just as I am?"

"That is exactly what you must believe," was the answer. "You must come to him just as you are."

The young girl felt overwhelmed as the simple truth took possession of her mind. She went to her room knelt down, and offered God her heart, guilty, vile as it was, to be cleansed and made fit for his own indwelling. As she knelt, peaceful, overflowing joy filled her soul. Inspired by the new and rapturous experience,she then and there wrote the hymn beginning:

"Just as I am without one plea
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bid'st me come to the,
O, lamb of God, I come."

Little did Charlotte Elliot think of fame,or of the immortality of the words she had written. It was simply putting her own heart on paper; and the hymn, born of mysterious experience, appeals to other hearts needing the cleansing power of the blood of the Lamb.

Charlotte was possessed of literary gifts, and when the editor of the "Literary Remembrances" died she took charge. In making up her first number, she inserted several of her poems anonymously; among them was "Just as I am." It immediately attracted attention, was widely copied, and passed into the hymnology of the Church.—Selected.

Intercession.

When Dr. Doddridge lived at Northampton there was a poor Irishman condemned for sheep stealing. In those days the statue book of England was cruel. He scarcely thought that there was proof of the man's guilt, and he believed in the book that teaches that a man is better than a sheep. He traveled, toiled and tried hard to get the man a reprieve, but unsuccessfully; he came back and the man was hanged. On the road to the execution the convict got them to stop the cart just opposite Dr. Doddridge's house, and kneeling down, he said: "God bless you Dr. Doddridge; every vein in my heart loves you, every drop of my blood loves you, for you tried to save every drop of it." There was a man! What love he has for the intercessor who has failed. But Christ has succeeded, and what a price he has given. O that every one would feel this, and be led to exclaim, "Every vein of my heart loves thee, O Christ, every drop of my blood loves thee, for thou hast died to save me."

The Opium Traffic in America.

The traffic in opium, which is being carried on at this port, is a great disgrace to our nation and govornment. It is on the increase year by year, in spite of heavy import duties and municipal taxes. Last year 63,189 pounds of prepared opium paid customs duties amounting to over three-quarters of a million of dollars. This year it is evident we are going to break the record. From January 1, 1892, to July 8th, there have been regularly imported at this Customs House 49,856 pounds of smoking extract. At this rate, by the end of the year, we shall have imported nearly 100,000 pounds of the opium extract, yielding a revenue to the Treasury of the United States of $1,200,000 from a form of the drug only used for smoking. Besides this there is a great deal of opium smuggled into the country and illicitly prepared in this country. That all this opium is consumed by Chinese is simply impossible, and the conclusion is beyond doubt that the greater part is used by white people, amongst whom opium smoking is fast becoming a vice.

A short time ago petitions were signed by the people of our churches, and forwarded to Congress, urging both houses to take the matter up, and pass a law forbidding the importatiou, manufacture, and sale of the extract of opium under heavy penalties, and authorizing the officers of the law to destroy all forms of the drug prepared for vicious indulgence wherever found. Letters were received from the President, Secretary of Treasury, Speaker of the House, and our representatives in Congress, all promising their favorable consideration. Two months have passed, but nothing, apparently has been done.

Dr. Hammond pushes a series of vigorous resolutions through the General Conference on the subject, and other religious and philanthropic societies have done the same. This is good so far, but it is evident we have not sufficiently influenced public opinion to carry our point, and agitation will have to be kept up long and loud before Congress takes action. Meanwhile the evil is growing. More opium is coming in every month. It is being smuggled in, the extract is being manufactured in our cities, and so lucrative is the trade becoming and so growing the demand that it is actually proposed to grow the poppy in our valleys, and manufacture it here. When that day comes,opium will be a recognized industry, American capital will be invested in its manufacture, and it will be difficult to do anything in the way of reform. Now is the time for action before American prople and American capital get interested. At present the only difficulty is to arouse the great, lazy, selfish public to shake off and crush this insidious evil before it gathers sufficient strength to enslave our race, and overwhelm us as a nation. Pitiable Mothers.

Of all classes of people to be pitied in this world it is the mother who has a wayward daughter, As a general rule such a calamity falls to the lot of a meek little woman, a diffident creature, who would suffer any amount of torture rather than face a scene with her unruly daughter, and thus the girl comes out victorious in every word scrimmage with the tired, patient mother. Mothers must meet unflinchingly the duties God has placed upon them, and remember that in their hands lie the future of their families for weal or woe. It is expected that they love their children dearly, but that should not be an impediment to their correcting them when they stand in need of it. In their infancy all they have to do is to cry for what they want, and the weak mother granting it will plant the first seeds of the evil which is to bear such bitter fruit. In girlhood the daughter soon learns that her mother's will is a matter of very little consequence; a little teasing and the point is gained. And when she arrives at womanhood, ah, then your trials begin. You begin to learn the truth of the old adage that "when your children are little they tread on your lap, but when they grow older they tread on your heart."

Spurgeon on "Down Grade" Theology.

The preaching of Spurgeon was of the old positive, scriptural sort,without any accommodations of it to modern science or progress. Here is the way he once talked in a sermon about the "down grade" theology of some modern preachers:

"When a man gets to cutting down sin, paring down depravity, and making little of future punishment, let him no longer preach to you. Some modern divines whittle away the gospel to the small end of nothing. They make our divine Lord to be a sort of blessed nobody; they bring down salvation to mere salvability, make certainties into possibilities, and treat verities as mere opinions. When you see a preacher making the gospel by degrees and miserably less,till there is not enough of it left to make soup for a sick grasshopper, get you gone. . . . As for me, I believe in the colossal; a need deep as hell and grace as high as heaven. I believe in a pit that is bottomless and a heaven that is topless. I believe in an infinite God and an infinite atonement, infinite love and mercy, an everlasting covenant ordered in all things and sure, of which the substance and the reality is an infinite Christ."

Whole Heartedness.

Dr. Talmage describes the sight he saw of boys bathing in the morning. One of them just dipped his toes in the water, and cried out, as he shivered, "Oh, it's so cold!" Another went in up to his ankles, and declared that it was fearfully chilly. Another ran to the bank and took a header. He rose all in a glow, his blood all circulating, and he cries, "Delicious! What a beautiful morning. I am all in a glow. The water is splendid."

That is a boy for enjoying a bath!

You young Christians who are paddling about in the shallows of religion, and dipping your toes into it, you stand shivering in the cold air of the world which you are afraid to leave. Oh, that you would plunge into the river of life! How it would brace you! What tone it would give you! In for it! Be a Christian out and out. Serve the Lord with your whole being!

EDITORIAL.

A CRYING EVIL.

Our moral sense was greatly shocked the first time that we saw the words, "Licensed Gambling House," printed over the door of a public house, and we have felt a sense of shame at every such scene since that time, whether the words were emblazoned in gold over the door of a fashionable saloon on main street, or daubed with lamp black in front of a low dive down town, or over a cross-roads country store. We suppose that the object of the law-makers in requiring such a sign was to compel dealers to advertise their business. But, alas, it advertises entirely too much for the good name and character of our commonwealth. It proclaims to the passer-by not only the fact that individuals are here engaged in the debasing business of getting money without giving value received, in corrupting the morals, receiving the habits, blighting the hopes and destroying the happiness, the fortunes and the lives of men, but that the state, composed of the men who are the bone and sinew of the country, in which is represented the patriot, the philanthropist the Christian, is a partner in this awful business. It not only gives license permission to the perpetrators of all the horrible crimes of the gambling hell, but it actually receives part of the income from the debasing business.

The great majority of the leading papers of the land united in the war against the Louisiana Lottery, and there was universal joy when the vile monster was throttled. But is not the gambling vice more debasing and destructive to character and fortune than the lottery could possibly be? It is wrong in principle, it cultivates dishonesty, and a greed for gain that is working wide pread ruin even in business circles, to say nothing of its demoralizing influence. Men—and even women—patronize pooling places, deal in futures, and gamble in public and in private. It has gotten to such a pass that even a church sociable can hardly be made interesting without some game of chance is introduced something near akin to if not downright gambling. It is the spirit of the age, and seems to be in the very atmosphere we breathe. If it continues there is no telling what the end will be.

One reason for all this is the "license" system. This takes away the odium that would otherwise attach to the vice. It gilds it over with the endorsement of public approval, and makes it respectable. The young man sees the great seal of the common wealth, with the signatures of these high in authority, printed at the entrance of these "hells," and if we call the proprietor to account for debasing our boys, he flaunts his license in our faces and points to the shekels in our tills and shouts with defiance, I have paid for the privilege."

Men talk about "regulation." You might as well talk about regulating a den of rattle-snakes or a band of hungry hyenas as to regulate a saloon or a gambling hell, or any other vice. Let our statutes put the stamp of infamy upon these iniquities as it does upon murder and theft. Let them be driven form the fashionable corners both in city and country places. It is weakness and folly to say that because men will practice such things, and do it secretly, therefore we had better put the stamp of approval upon them and give them the chief places in our commercial centers and share in the profits. This is acknowledging our inability to uphold the right; doing just what the devil wanted the Son of God to do—acknowledge his authority and go into partnership with him. If men are determined to persist in pernicious practices let it be under cover of darkness—away from the public gaze, and at the risk of penalties in proportion to the same. It is high time that the moral sense of the better element of our country was asserting it self in such well found statutes as shall cause these common vices to be less brazen, and as shall tend to drive them back to that pit of darkness from whence they come.

THREE GREAT MEN GONE.

How are the mighty fallen and how rapidly are the men who have figured prominently in the affairs of our country, in both church and state, being called away. But recently we noticed the deth of Gen. Butler and Ex-President Hayes, and now we chronicle the departure of three others—two statesmen and one minister—who rendered distinguished service to the people of our country each in his sphere, and whose removal from earth will be widely and deeply mourned.

Justice Lucius Quentius Cartius Lamer died at Macon, Ga., the 23rd of January. He was born in Putnam Co., Ga., Sep. 17th, 1825, and graduated from Emory College when twenty years of age. He took an active part in the war on the Southern side, was a member of Mr. Cleveland's cabinet, as Secretary of the Interior, and was afterwards appointed Justice of the Supreme Court, by Mr. Cleveland. He was member of the M. E. church, South, and Rev. W. A. Chandler, presided at his funeral.

Bishop Phillips Brooks, of Boston, Mas., died the same day at Boston. He was born in Boston, Mass., in 1835. He afterwards graduated at Harvard College. He was a man of broader mind and more liberal spirit than most of the leading men of his denomination. He had a great intellect and a heart that took in the world. He was too great to belong exclusively to any one organization. He was claimed by Methodists and Presbyterians as well as by Episcopalians. It is said that during the Moody meetings in Boston some years ago, he would go at the noon hour and hold short talks with the workmen in the shoe factories and kneel with them in the shavings and pray without book or gown. He was a bachelor. His "Lectures on Preaching," delivered before the Yale University, had a wide reading, as did all his contributions to the press.

Gen. James G. Blaine, after a protracted illness, breathed his last on Friday, the 27th ult. He was considered by many as the typical American. He was one of America's great statesmen, and in the mention made in after years of his career, his name will be associated with those of Clay and Webster. His personal magnetism was great and he drew to himself friends who were willing to make any sacrifice for him. Now that he is gone, his former political opponents vie with each other in complimentary tributes to his virtues. He was, if we mistake not, a commmunicant of the Presbyterian church, and not a Roman Catholic, as was commonly believed.

REV. W. H. HOWARD AND WIFE GONE.

While our pen is busy chronicling the death of dear friends near home and distinguished statesmen abroad here comes the "Pacific Advocate" announcing the departure from earth of Rev. W. H. Howard and his noble wife, of Pendleton, Oregon. Brother Howard was a supernumary member of the Columbia Conference, but lived in the bounds of the East Columbia Conference, and last year filled the vacancy made by the sickness and removal of Brother R. G. Isabel. He occupied the parsonage at the time of our visit to Pendleton, where he and Sister Howard gave us a cordial welcome. He was the father of Rev. M. V. Howard, the presiding elder of Pendleton District, and Sister H. was the sister of Rev. A. B. Wilson, of the Memphis Conference. He was a devout Christian, whole-souled Methodist, and an ardent lover and able defender of his church, in the service of which he and his companion had spent all the fortune acquired in early life. We count it a great pleasure to have been entertained in the home of this venerable couple, who have been greatly honored in the children they have raised and given the church. We sat spell-bound for hours and listened while our brother related in brief the story of his eventful life, his trials and triumphs in California and Oregon, where he contended earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and of the times of refreshing he had experienced in the service of the Lord. He was a man of positive character, ardent temperament and apparently as artless as a child. He received us into his confidence at once, went with us in a house-to-house canvass, for subscribers for our paper, heading the list with his own name, accompanied us to the depot, and with a hearty grasp of the hand bade us adieu and gave us his parting blessing. We cannot keep back the tears as we pen these lines. We love and honor the memory of the noble men and women who have not only sacrificed their earthly possessions, but have counted not their own lives dear unto them as they have thrown themselves into the breach and battled bravely for the truth and the right here in the Northwest during the thirty or forty years just past. Their reward is on high.

Brother W. H. Howard was born in Tennessee, August, 1824, and in 1842 was happily married to Miss Margaret Wilson. They celebrated their golden wedding last February, and within two weeks' time from December 26th, 1893, (the day that our brother was taken) they were reunited on the other shore.

We extend heart-felt sympathy to our Brother M. V. Howard and the other members of the family in their deep affliction and sorrow. Surely they have a rich legacy left them in the pure and blameless lives and triumph faith of such parents, and a wonderful incentive to press onward to the "land that is very far away."

"We are traveling home to God,
In the way our fathers trod;
They are happy now and we Soon their happiness shall see."

BOOK AND PERIODICAL NOTICES.

The "Sunday School Missionary" is a newsy little sheet of eight pages published by the American Sunday School Union in the interest of missions. The January number now before us gives much interesting information from the home mission fields throughout our country.

If you want to find out all about the great Fair at Chicago send to J. H. Campbell, 159 and 161 Adams St., Chicago, and get the "World's Columbian Exposition, Illustrated." It is a monthly publication of 20 pages and contains elegant illustrations of the principal buildings and the grounds and will give a complete history and description of this wonderful exposition. It advocates Sunday opening, which we do not like, but otherwise it is full of interesting matter which the reader would do well to know whether he visits the Fair or not. The subscription price is $3.00 for 12 numbers.

We have just received a copy of a medium-sized, neatly bound book called the "National Hymn Book," compiled by Robert Ellis Thompson, purporting to be for use "by the American churches." The compilation is made up of the hymns in most common use in the standard hymn books of the Baptist, Congregationalist. Episcopal, Lutheran, Methodist, (North and South), Presbyterian and Reformed churches, with the most usual tunes, and also from some privately edited books—30 in all. By the side of each hymn is a series of references to each book selected from. It is intended for use in union meetings, hotel services and the like, where people of all denominations are thrown together away from their own churches. The hymns appear to be of a substantial character, and free from the slight chaffy productions found in many modern books. We notice many of the grand old pieces that we have been accustomed to hear from our childhood. We have thought it a misfortune that the Methodists, not only of America, but of the world, could not unite in the use of a book gotten up something after this plan. It would tend greatly to help preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. The price of this book is $50. per hundred; $6.50 per dozen or 60 cents for single copies. Address John D. Wattles, Philadelphia, Pa.

Rev. S. W. Cope, Chillicothe, Mo., writes: I get the "Methodist" regularly and would like to show my appreciation of it by sending you a few copies of my little books.

The books referred to are two copies each of "The Christian Ministry" and "The Great Evil," which have before received favorable notice in these columns. They ought to be in the homes of all our people. By purchasing them you will be benefited yourself, and help in the support of a faithful minister who has worn himself out in the service of the Lord and His church. We do not know the price, but suppose it is about 50 cents for each copy. Address the author at Chillicothe, Mo.

"CHARACTER SKETCHES."

A copy of this popular book has been upon our table for some time. We hesitated to notice it without the opportunity of a more careful examination. We are now prepared to give it our hearty endorsement. The subject matter is made up of "a series of illustrated discussions, depicting those peculiarities of character which contribute to the ridicule and failure, or to the dignity and success of mankind. Also, a number of moral, practical and religious subjects, presented in an entirely new and striking manner, illustrated with our fifty engravings, from the original black-board drawings, by Rev. George A. Lofton, A. M., D. D." The book is handsomely bound. It contains an introduction by O. P. Fitzgerald, D. D. Mr. Lofton is a Baptist minister, but the book is entirely non-sectarian. The subjects are practical and are ably discussed, while the quaint pictures serve as object lessons to help retain the wholesome truths in the mind. Such chapters as "The Rock of Ages," "Sowing and Reaping Wild Oats," Profanity," "The Little Foxes," and many others that might be named, with their accompanying cuts, make an indelible impression upon the mind. The common vices of mankind are strongly caricatured. It would be an excellent book for the center tables of our homes, to be read by our young people, here in the Northwest. Address Southwestern Publishing Company, Nashville, Tenn., and get circulars and agents' terms.

OUR SABBATHS.

"Sunday observance is a matter that each one must settle for himself," said our friend, with an air of indifference. He had frequently boasted of his liberal views upon this subject. Many a time he had indulged in words of quiet humor, to show the contempt for that which he was pleased to denominate "the Puritanic strictness of Sabbatarians." This remark of his was made on the Lord's Day; and, satchel in hand, he was hastening to the depot, having a business engagement in a distant part of the country. Our friend was a member of the church. He was leaving behind all sacred duties of the family circle; before him were hours of monotonous Sunday travel; conversation foreign to the spirit of the holy day; reading that chiefly related to stocks and marts of trade.

In all this was he not altogether in harmony with his avowed principles? The Sabbath, in his view, was destitute of sacred meaning above other days of the week. He was a "liberal" Christian—tolerant of others' opinions, and as to Sabbath observance professing to believe that he was his "brother's keeper." He did not see that Sabbath rest was so necessary, either to individual or public prosperity. He did not hear in the very depths of his soul God's voice saying: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." It had not yet come to him that the Lord's Day was a sign of His covenant; that it was the perpetual commemmoration of the Lord's resurrection from the grave, and therefore visibly represented all the blessings of man's redemption. As he journeyed on that holy day, "finding his own pleasure," speaking his own words, the tender words of Moses addressed to God's erring people might have been appropriate: "O that there were such a hear in them, that they would fear Me, and keep all My commandments always, that it might be well with them, and with their children forever."

Believers are everywhere summoned to watchfulness, lest the divine law of the Sabbath be broken. The customs and demands of modern society have never seemed so imperative as now. In little things "offenses" may come. Having yielded at first to that which is questionable. The way has been opened to commit flagrant transgressions. How easy to lose an inward sense of guilt! "Having once been enlightened," it is possible to so break God's commandments that their profound seriousness utterly ceases to affect us.

The Sabbath is being fiercely assailed. The opposition of the carnal heart to God's commandments can only explain this antagonism. But the danger is far greater from silent betrayal than from open assault. Worldly tendencies meet us on every hand. We pause to ask: "Is it any harm to do this?" Or possibly we begin to compromise with evil by saying: "It is less harmful to do this than to do that" which the weakened conscience of another permits.—Christian Advocate.

"Tis I, Be Not Afraid."

A well known evangelist relates a striking incident of a lady of his acquaintance who was supported under a great reverse of fortune by the grace of the "Rest Giver," our blessed Saviour. She lost the sum of £30,000, and had to put down horses and carriages, and take a house for the purpose of letting lodgings.

"I would not," she says, "have missed these dark days for double £30,000. I now know the preciousness of a Saviour's love in a way I never knew before. Jesus is worth more to me than horses, houses and lands. The first time I let my house, I said, 'Lord, I can never wait upon these people; I have never done it before, and I feel I can not do it now.' I began to weep, when that sweet text came into my heart, 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' The table was soon laid and the lodgers seated. As the bell rang for food to be served, I said, 'Lord, I cannot serve at the table; my trouble is greater than I can bear. While in this distressed state another text instantly came rushing into my mind; 'I am among you as he that serveth.' In a moment I had great joy for I seemed to see my Saviour at my side, and the service I so much dreaded thus became delightful. Every day since then the Lord has been tenfold more to me than all my loss of wealth."—Christian Intelligencer.

REBUILDING THE WALL.

Neh. IV. 9-21.

BY AMOS R. WELLS.

EXPLANATORY NOTES.

Nehemiah was about four months on his journey from Susa, reaching Jerusalem toward the end of July, B. C. 444.——JUDAH (v. 10). The half-hearted, half-heathen Jews from the surrounding towns.——STRENGTH OF THE BEARERS OF BURDENS IS DECAYED (v. 10). The working parties were weakened by the withdrawal of so many to stand on guard—DWELT BY THEM (v. 12). By Nehemiah's opponents.——RETURN UNTO US (v. 12). They were urging the Jews that had come from outside Jerusalem to desert.——LOWER PLACES, HIGHER PLACES (v. 13). Where the wall was low or the ground was high. The families were placed in exposed situations because they would fight better.——HABERGEONS (v. 16). Coats of mail.——THE WORK IS GREAT (v. 19). The walls were about four miles in circuit.

COMMENTS,

MADE OUR PRAYER.....SET A WATCH (v. 9). The right kind of prayer leads to watching; the right kind of watching leads to prayer. If these two things do not work together in our lives, it is because something is wrong with one of them.

WE SHALL NOT BE ABLE (v. 10). It is more Christian to overrate one's ability than to underrate it, especially if we say, "I can do all things THROUGH CHRIST who strengthens me." The people who are always prophesying the failure of their undertakings have at least one satisfaction,—they always turn out true prophets. Distrust of our own ability is often only a cloak to hide our lack of faith in God.

THEY SHALL NOT KNOW (v. 11). Few of Satan's poisons are so deadly as those he distills from the fog. The open and definite attacks make against them, Christians have courage to rebuff; but they tremble before ghosts. "Your Christian course will ruin your worldly prospects;" "Your bold stand against wrong will rouse men's anger;" "Will THEY like it?"—such suggestions of the evil one are none the less deadly because they are mist and nothing more.

RETURN UNTO US (v. 12). Young Christians who think that by a single leap they can escape bad companions, bad thoughts, bad habits, safe in the fold of the church, will fall, if they are not careful, because of this very assurance. The evils of their past lives will lie in wait at every corner, crying, "Return unto us." Let them be ready with an answer

PEOPLE AFTER THEIR FAMILIES (v. 13). Get a family of six, all of one purpose, and zealous in this common interest, and those six will do the work of sixty disassociated people laboring at the same task. Christians who do not strive eagerly to make a Christian unit of their homes are missing their most important strategic point.

REMEMBER THE LORD. (v. 14). One would think that a Christian, with a Christian's knowledge of God's power and wisdom and love, would be in no danger of forgetting him. On the contrary, however, often the most trivial things in the universe—a frown, a toothache, a broken cup—will make us forget utterly the most momentous thing in the universe.

GOD HAD BROUGHT THEIR COUNSEL TO NOUGHT (v. 15). If we had been doing as much as Nehemiah, we should be likely to spoil the whole, in our minds if not in our words, by taking the credit to ourselves. Those who do the most are most conscious of how little they are doing, and how much God is doing through them.

THE RULERS WERE BEHIND (v.16). Did any of the toilers in stone and mortar grumble at the men behind them who merely gave orders? Not if they were wise men and knew anything about the toil of responsibility and planning and worry undergone by those overseers. Let no one refuse to be a ruler of men if God calls him to that labor, but let no one seek the task thinking it an easy job.

WITH THE OTHER HAND HELD A WEAPON (v. 17). We can hardly see how the walls could have been rebuilt any sooner. Evidently the weapon in one hand was no hindrance. And neither is it a hindrance if we go to our work carrying in one hand the Bible, "the sword of the spirit." Whatever our work this weapon reinforces the tools. It sharpens the pen, strengthens the plow, directs the plane.

HE THAT SOUNDED THE TRUMPET WAS BY ME (v. 18). Much excellent work is largely lost for lack of focusing. There was that line of wall—one would think that it formed sufficient common bond. It stretched out its uneven lengths much like some organizations we know of, that serve merely as a chalk line, along which the scattered members can toe the mark. But when it comes to effective fighting, a personal rallying point is needed; and happy are those organizations whose power is thus focused on the one Person, on Christ.

OUR GOD SHALL FIGHT FOR US (v. 20). But though God would fight for them, he would not fight instead of them.

FROM THE RISING OF THE MORNING (v. 21). They were early risers, like all zealous workmen. They knew that "the morning hour has gold in its mouth," and a thousand things better than gold. — Golden Rule.

——o——

"The heart with love to God inspired, with love to man will glow."

Lights on the Lesson.

PRAYER.....WATCH (v. 9) Watching and praying, weak when apart, are a Gibralter of strength when united. Praying is not a substitute for the use by any means, but the power that inspires zeal and activity, quickens the invention, sharpens the intellect. And on the other hand, as Dr. Crosby says, "All the natural means, whether of mind or matter, form channels through which God conveys his grace in answer to prayer. To stop these channels is to cancel prayer."—Peloubet.

AND JUDAH SAID (v.10). This was a danger far more serious than that which came directly to the good governor from the wicked Sanballat. The solicitation of friends was far more likely to weaken his forces than the intimidation of foes. This would tend to consolidate the people for defence, while that would draw them off, little by little, a few to this village and a few to that. The pleas of friendship are stronger than the threats of enmity.—Boynton.

MUCH RUBBISH (v. 10). So much has to be undone before you can do anything. So much has to be cleared away before you can get down to bed rock and build at all. Precious little inspiration is there in this sort of work, and sometimes there seems to be no end to it.—The Baptist Teacher.

I EVEN SET THE PEOPLE (v. 13). It is a mistake to suppose that the Christian is not to use all the tactful resources of the mind to carry on God's work. Piety and good generalship go well together. Many a good enterprise has come to grief because God's people seemed to proceed on the assumption that religious and spiritual work did not require earthly care and talent to guide it.—Pentecost.

FIGHT FOR YOUR BRETHREN, YOUR SONS, YOUR DAUGHTERS, YOUR WIVES, AND YOUR HOUSES (v. 14). When we are working or fighting for the cause of God, we are engaged on behalf of the truest, highest, and most enduring interests of those who are dearest to us, and of our own also.—Clarkson.

WE RETURNED ALL OF US TO THE WALL (v, 15). No church (or state) can live by fighting. This is partly true of direct battling with evil tendencies and habits in ourselves and others; let good be nourished and strengthened, and evil will decay. A church must be militant and ever ready to fight, but a church mainly militant will effect little good.—Lewis.

HIS SWORD GIRDED BY HIS SIDE (v. 18). Memorizing texts is not as common now as it used to be, but it is a pity if the children are not taught by heart many Bible verses. There come a thousand occasions through life when a text quoted out of the memory will be a sword drawn to smite an enemy.—Westminster Teacher.

RESORT YE THITHER (v.20). There are times and places which rally God's people. They must draw together. They must forsake for awhile their special, individual appointment. They must obey the trumpet which summons them to united efforts against a desperate assault. This is especially true in connection with the attacks of infidelity and superstition. —Rawlinson.

SO WE LABORED (v.21). Nehemiah was not the only man who was at this time building a city wall amid discouragements. But the fact that he was building Jerusalem's walls, the walls that should defend the interests of God, lifts him up amid the heroes of mankind, and makes his work immortal. So our own commonplace lives take to themselves high dignity because of the God for whose cause we strive.—Hurlburt.

Why He Gave up the Business.

"I hear that Smith has sold out his saloon," said one of a couple of middle aged men, who sat sipping their beer and eating a bit of cheese in a Smithfield Street saloon the other night.

"Yes," responded the other, rather slowly. "What was the reason? I thought he was just coining money there."

The other nibbled a cracker abstractedly for a moment and then said: "It's rather a funny story. Smith, you know, lives on Mount Washington, right near me, where he has an excellent wife, a nice home, and three as pretty children as ever played outdoors. All boys, you know, the oldest not over nine, and all about the same size.

"Well he went home one afternoon last week, and found his wife out shopping, or something of that sort. He went on through the house into the back yard; and there under the apple tree, were the little fellows playing. They had a bench and some bottles and tumblers, and were playing 'keep saloon.' He noticed they were drinking something out of a pail, and they acted tipsy. The youngest who was behind the bar, had a towel round his waist and was setting up drinks pretty freely. Smith walked over and looked into the pail. It was beer and the two boys were so drunk that they staggered. A neighbor's boy a couple of years older, lay asleep behind the tree.

"'We's playin' s'loon, papa, an' I was a sellin' it just like you,' said the little fellow. Smith poured out the beer, and carried the drunken boy home, and then took his own boys in and put them to bed. When his wife came home she found him crying like a child. He came back down town that night, and sold out his businesss, and says he will never sell or drink another drop of liquor." —Selected.

WORLDLINESS IN THE CHURCH.

BY REV. R. L. CLARK.

We are employing all the factors as best we can within our power to get and keep the church spiritual and free from all worldly innovations, as the means of saving sinners.

A worldly church can never save souls. Like begets like here as elsewhere. The church can never raise the world above the plane of life that she exhibits in her practical intercourse with it. If she is worldly, she can only make the world religiously worldly, and thereby affords it that light that is darkness, and of which the Savior asks: "How great is that darkness?" When we hear a church member say, in vindication of his indulgence in what is called innocent amusements, that the harm is in their abuse, we know that he is of the world wordly. Who ever heard of "a good tree bringing forth evil fruit," or an evil tree bringing forth good fruit?" "Not one: no; not one." To keep the church at a safe distance from the charms of the old serpent, which is inherent in the doctrine that evil is in the abuse and not in the nature of a thing, which would otherwise draw her into his fatal coils. God has instructed her not to look upon the wine when it is red in the cup; touch not; taste not; handle not. Be ye separate. Avoid the very appearance of evil. On this ground is she alone safe. And here alone is she the salt of the earth. If evil is in quantity, then we have no quality, then "he that is unjust in much" is not unjust in little. An intelligent stranger said to us on the cars a few nights ago, when the subject of church purity was being discussed, that there were three churches in his town and all of them danced, played at games, went to theatres, etc. (We suppose he meant that some of the members of these churches did those things, which, of course, is not churches doing them as they are continued in their fellowship.) We told him that we were decidedly of the opinion that his town would be better off without said churches. Mark you, he said, this in the vindication of worldly amusements." "If the foundation is destroyed what can the righteous do?"

LETTER FROM BROTHER STATELER.

Dear Brother Stanley: My health has not been vigorous since the weather has become cold, hence I am at home a good deal. I preached frequently up till nearly Christmas, but took cold and have had to desist for sometime past. I had thought of spending Christmas in Bitter Root, but for reasons not necessary to mention I was prevented. If I had suitable company I would go yet this winter to a milder clime for a few months, but I dislike to travel so far alone.

The "Methodist," since it became a weekly, comes regularly, and is in good time, and I think the patrons ought to be satisfied, yea, pleased, and the subscriptions ought greatly to increase.

I am so situated that I cannot do much towards getting subscribers for the paper. I propose, however, to do this. I enclose ten dollars, and wish you to send ten copies for one year to ten poor widows, or to other persons who would like to read the paper but are unable to pay for it. This will help a little in meeting the increased expense of publication.

I want to say in conclusion that my face is still toward the mount of God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and my hope of immortality and eternal life is very steadfast. The larger part of my old companions are on the other shore, safe at home, and I am pressing on to overtake them.

O, think what a shout of victory we will raise when we get home and utter the triumphant words, "safe at rest." May we all meet there. I wish to be remembered to my friends. Tell them I love them still.

Your Brother, L. B. Stateler.

Leland, Idaho.

Our meeting continues with unabated interest. 10 accessions to date and more to follow. One day last week the young folks planned for a dance, but in a night or so the fiddler was converted, and then two of the leading dancers, and on Sunday we received them into the church. So you see what the Lord is doing for us here at Leland. The Lord be praised.

Your Brother,
W. S. Hornbuckle.

Jan. 23rd.

Spokane, Wash.

Dear "Methodist:"—Our work is steadily moving forward in Spokane.

We have as faithful a band of workers, as loyal to the church, as it has ever been my privilege to be associated with.

Our congregations are, I think, slightly on the increase, our prayer-meetings are well attended and spiritual; the Sunday Schoo is growing; and the Epworth League seems to be on the upward grade.

We have quite a live ministerial association in this place, whose meetings are characterized by a cordial fraternity, though the members have the utmost freedom in the discussion of the various topics introduced.

They have lately started a movement looking to the removal of taxation from the church property in this State. Certainly, a most needed reform. This State, and California, are the only ones, among the States, yielding to this infidel sentiment and clamor.

I trust our present legislature will have the wisdom and magnanimity to remove this stain from the escutcheon of our fair young State.

We are engaged in a protracted effort at our church. The outlook is encouraging.

I am expecting Bro. Shelton, of Dayton, this evening to assist me.

Our church, here, has been signally honored in that we have among our membership, a converted Jewess—She is faithful and zealous, loves the church, and abounds in good works.

The ladies, through their Aid Society, are doing good work.

J. W. Craig.

Island City, Oregon.

Dear Brother Stanley:—I closed my meeting last night after running three weeks, during which I did all the preaching except three nights, when Bro. Adkins was with me, besides I led the singing most of the time. I would have continued this week, but I had an attack of nervous prostration and was forced to discontinue. Yesterday I received a young man into the church, making five conversions, one reclamation and eight accessions since conference. You heard something of this work at conference, but I think it will come up all right this year. I will do my duty, God helping me, and preach the Word." Amen!

P. M. Bell.

PROVIDENTIAL, CIRCUMSTANTIAL, OR FINANCIAL. WHICH?

Rosalia, Wash., Jan. 23rd, '93.

All arrangements had been made to go to Pendleton, Oregon, Jan. 4th, 1893, to help Bro. F. C. Adkins in a revival meeting for two weeks. After taking my wife to Bro. A. H. Crow's, near Oakesdale, and reaching the train, you may imagine our disappointment when the Union Pacific agent said: "No half fare permits received yet, for 1893." Not being in a condition to incur the expense of such a long trip (400 miles) at full fare, we telegraphed the situation. Bro. Adkins called over the telephone, in answer, and we concluded that we had better postpone this united effort, although much to our regret. There were three protracted meetings, then, in progress at Oakesdale: Methodist (North) United Brethren(in whose house we preach regular), and Cumberland Presbyterian. Bro. F. R. Spaulding, Methodist Pastor, insisted on me remaining there and helping him, but under the circumstances, I declined. Bro. W. H. Carder, of "Seltice" Junction, on the Union Pacific, had invited me some time before to preach at the school-house, there. This seemed to be my opportunity, and the first preaching by the M. E. church, South, was begun Sunday, Jan. 8th." Ten nights, there, has resulted in a great awakening and the organization of a new society of twelve members, five new ones, and $670. subscribed to build a Methodist church on a large corner lot, also donated, in this new town site just plotted under the name: Aurora, Wash.

THE WORK OF DEATH.

IN MEMORIAM.

"Know ye not that a prince and great man is fallen this day in Israel?"

Hiram Gray died at his home near Radersburg, Montana, on the morning of Jan. 16th, 1893, aged 62 years, 11 months, and 8 days. He was born near Sonora, Hardin Co., Ky. Feb. 8th, 1830. His parents, Joseph and Matilda Gray, were members of the Baptist church. Bro. Gray came to Alder Gulch in Nov. 1863, and settled upon the ranch where he died in 1865.

He was married to Mrs. Sarah W. Griffith on the 15th of March, 1872, whom, with a step-daughter, he leaves to mourn their great loss. In the last days of Nov. 1882, he was happily converted and from that time till his death, he lived a faithful and consistent member of the church.

It may be interesting to relate the circumstances which led to his conversion, as told to the writer. In Nov. 1882, God visited their home and took away an only grand-daughter. It seemed that the separation was greater than he could bear. He could rest neither day nor night until he felt sure that he was ready to meet her on the other shore. Every day he went into the grove and spent hours alone with his God. After some eight days he found that peace and assurance which he had so earnestly sought. In his after experience, he said "I can now see why God took our little Mary. He just placed her over there that we might follow."

"God moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform." His conversion was genuine. He often remarked to his beloved wife, "I act as if I were going to stay here twenty years, and live as if I were going to die tomorrow." The messenger found him at his post.

His home and hospitality were free to all, but especially to ministers. His funeral was held at the family residence on the 18th of January at 2 p. m., conducted by the Rev. R. S. Clark, who was sent for by special request.

His remains were followed to the grave by a large concourse of friends and neighbors.

His Pastor.

——o——

It is with sadness that we record the death of Brother Hiram Gray. His bright and friendly face was one of the first that greeted us after our arrival at our circuit home (that of Bro. and Sister Stateler)on Crow Creek early in the winter of 1871, and the hospitality of his (then) bachelor home was along with the first extended to us in Montana. But for the fact of our dullness at taking a hint (always a failing with us), before departing on a trip across the mountains to fill an appointment, we would nave enjoyed the honor of presiding at the ceremonies of his marriage. We often laughed and rejoiced with him at the change his marriage made in his bachelor home. But his hospitality was always generous, and has often been enjoyed by this writer. We were also present when he united with the church at Willow Creek. This made the greatest change of all. He was like a new man, cheerful, contented and happy. His kind words and kind treatment during the first year of our stay in what seemed then a wilderness, will never be forgotten. Into the little grove, of which the obituary speaks, we used to retire to get strength and consolation for the difficult work before us. How many of the old pioneers are being called away. May they all be as ready as was our brother. May the presence of the great Comforter cheer the lonely hearts of the bereaved ones in their deep affliction until the word shall be pronounced "It is enough, come up higher."

The "Montana Christian Advocate" chronicles the death of Sister Annora Thaxter, wife of Henry Thaxter, and daughter of Brother and Sister E. Notengham, now of Highwood, but formerly of Boulder Valley. It was in this Christian home that we were first entertained upon our arrival at our field of labor by one year ago last November. It was in a log cabin, but it seemed like a palace to us. Our departed sister was then a babe in her mother's arms. We watched her in her growth almost to womanhood, and while we weep over her early departure, while just in the prime of life, and extend our sympathy to the bereaved ones, yet with them we rejoice that "her last audible words were prayers and Christian songs." Thank God for the hope of immortality and eternal life.

The fell destroyer has been busy of late in the homes of our old friends. During our short stay at Boulder recently we learned for the first time of the decease of our young friend Sister Mattie Holt, daughter of James and Julia Holt, of Boulder Valley, which occusred some time in November last. She was only 18 years of age, young, bright, beautiful, and full of joy and hope for the future, yet suddenly cut down. We learned with much satisfaction that she made a profession of faith in Christ before her death. It was in the home of these friends also that we enjoyed a cordial welcome when but a boy preacher we found our way so far from our old home, away in Montana, in 1871. It was here that we were afterwards nursed for seven long weeks during a protracted spell of the fever that came well-nigh proving fatall. Mattie was then a bright faced little girl, and we remember how her face would shine and her eyes fairly sparkle with delight when she was permitted to perform the least little act in ministering to us. Our heart goes out in deep sympathy for the bereaved father and Christian mother, the uncle and aunt and brothers and sisters. May they not rest until they have the consolations of divine grace to sustain them, and until they can rejoice in hope of a happy meeting beyond the tide.

A Beautiful Evening Hymn.

BY JENNY M. BINGHAM.

That exquisite evening hymn, "Glory to thee, my God, this night," was written almost two hundred years ago, by Bishop Thomas Ken, of the English Church. He was educated at Winchester, College, and afterward wrote for that institution a Manual of Prayer, to which he added his morning, evening, and midnight hymns.

Before his death he requested that six of the poorest men of the parish might carry him to the grave, and that his funeral should not be attended with any pomp or ceremony. He had expressed a wish to be laid in his last resting place "under the east window of the chancel, just at sunrising." This was done, and in the quiet old churchyard at Frome, as the daylight brightened, they buried Bishop Ken, singing over him his own morning anthem of praise:

"Awake my soul, and with the sun."

His death was like a beautiful "going to sleep," thus exemplifying the words of his evening him:

"Teach me to live that I may dread
The grave as little as my bed;
Teach me to die that so I may Triumphant rise at the last day."

A New York paper, a few years ago, published the following incident in connection with the singing of this evening hymn:

It was midnight when the northern train rushed into the station at C——, usually so busy and bustling, but now comparatively quiet and deserted. There was a delay of some minutes, but no one got out. Many of the travelers were half asleep. Others were settling themselves comfortably in their wraps and rugs, preparatory for their long night journey before them. Suddenly the silence was most painfully broken by a loud, harsh voice from one of the cars, beginning to roar out a profane and ribald song. The passengers were shocked and indignant. They would gladly have silenced the vile and indecent singer, but how was this to be done? Hark! another voice is heard, sweet, clear, and childlike; the voice of a little girl distinctly singing the words:

"Glory to thee, my God, this night,
For all blessings of the light;
Keep me, oh, keep me, King of kings,
Beneath the shadow of thy wings,"

Only a few notes were sung, when the hint was taken, and another voice joined, then another and another. Manly bases and tenors threw in their deep tones with all their strength and soon a full volume of sacred melody arose on the night air, led by a litttle child, and the voice of the profane singer was heard no more.

God's Promise Sure.

Mr. Moody says: "When I was a young man I was clerk in the establishment of a man in Chicago, whom I observed frequently occupied sorting and marking bills. He explained to me what he had been doing; on some notes he had marked 'B,' on some 'D,' and on others 'G;' those marked 'B,' he told me, were bad, those marked 'D' were doubtful, and those with 'G' on them were good. 'And,' said he, 'you must treat all of them accordingly.' And thus people indorse God's promises, by marking some as bad and others as doubtful, whereas we ought to take all of them as good; for he has never once broken his word, and all that he says he will do will be done in the fullness of time." "For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him amen, unto the glory of God by us."

The promises contained in the Scripture are "exceeding great and precious," but what shall we say of the Promiser who stands at the back of every promise, and in whom they are all "yea and amen." Is it not strange that we should hesitate for a moment to claim them? We ought to seize these precious treasures, every one, and say, "They are mine."

Smile Whenever You Can.

When things don't go to suit you,
  And the world seems upside down,
Don't waste your time in fretting,
  But drive away that frown;
Since life is oft perplexing,
  'Tis much the wisest plan
To bear all trials bravely,
  And smile whene'er we can.

Why should you dread to-morrow,
  And thus despoil to-day?
For when you borrow trouble,
  You always have to pay.
It is a good old maxim,
  Which should be often preached—
Don't cross the bridge before you,
  Until the bridge is reached.

You might be spared much sighing,
  If you would keep in mind.
The thought that good and evil
  Are always here combined.
There must be something wanting,
  And though you roll in wealth,
You may miss from your casket
  That precious jewel—health.

And though you're strong and sturdy,
  You may have an empty purse;
(And earth has many trials
  Which I consider worse!)
But whether joy or sorrow
  Fill up your mortal span,
'Twill make your pathway brighter
  To smile whene'er you can.

SMALL BUT MIGHTY.

The Significance of What We Do.

The eventual importance of our words, acts, and gifts is seldom comprehended. A word spoken, a sentence written, or an act done, may seem a little thing, and yet the influence of each goes out like the ripples, which, though started by a falling pebble, extend themselves in ever widening circles until they break on distant shores. Here are some illustrations of this truth:

"It seemed a small thing, a matter of no consequence, that a woman whose name has long since been forgotten, dropped a tract in the way of a very wicked man: he picked it up and lead it, and it was the means of his conversion. In after years, that man, whose name was Richard Baxter, wrote a book entitled 'A Call to the Unconverted,' which was the means of bringing a multitude to God; among others, Phillip Doddridge, who wrote 'The Rise and Progress of Religion,' which has brought tens of thousands to Jesus;and among others the great Wilberforce, who wrote 'A Practical View of Christianity,' which brought thousands to Jesus; among others, Leigh Richmond who wrote 'The Dairyman's Daughter,' which has been the means of the conversions of numbers which no man can estimate."

So also the influence of even a small gift might be seen in a single illustration. There is doubtless no city in the Union where wealth is buried deeper, stored closer, or built higher than in New York. In 1626 the entire island of Manhattan was purchased from the Indians for the sum of $24. The significance of this small amount, when set at work to accumulate for its possessor, will appear when we assure ourselves of the fact, that had that twenty-four dollars been put out at compound interest at the date when the purchase was made, it would now aggregate an amount greater than the present value of the entire island, of every building, and the goods contained in these buildings, and the gold in all the banks, together with the sum total of all the wealth in every form today held upon what was once Manhattan Island. If the statement seems too marvelous to be true, each one can verify it for himself.

The money we wish to give to-day to support the church at home, or to sustain a missionary or establish a congregation abroad, may seem to be insignificant; but when we stop and contemplate what the eventual result will be, when eternity shall reveal the accumulated influence for good of that which shall go on year after year and century after century compounding itself long after the name and the remembrance of the giver have been forgotten by the generations which come after us—then and only then can we fully realize the blessedness of the privileges which God permits us now to enjoy when we contribute of our money for the support of the church or the salvation of men. The full significance of our acts and gifts can only be seen when viewed in the light of eternity.

From Father to Son.

One day a young man entered a merchant's office in Boston, and with a pale and careworn face, he said:

"Sir, I am in need of help. I have been unable to meet certain payments, because parties have not done as they agreed by me, and I would like to have $10,000. I came to you because you were a friend to my father, and might be a friend to me."

"Come in," said the old merchant; "Come in and have a glass of wine."

"No," said the young man, "I don't drink."

"Have a cigar, then."

"No, I never smoke."

"Well," said the old gentleman, "I would like to accommodate you, but I don't think I can."

"Very well," said the young man, as he was about to leave the room, "I thought perhaps you might. Good day sir."

"Hold on," said the merchant. "You don't drink?"

"No"

"Nor smoke!"

"No."

"Nor gamble, nor anything of that sort?"

"No, sir; I am superintendent of a Sunday-school."

"Well," said the merchant, "you shall have it, and three times the amount if yon wish. Your father let me have $5,000 once, and asked me the same questions. He trusted me, and I will trust you. No thanks—I owe it to you for your father's trust."—Presbyterian.

We do not have to be great in anything except faith to obtain great favor with God.

Light Through Confession.

BY REV. B. FAY MILLS.

In a large city I noticed an old man who had remained through the first and second meetings, and was standing as though he was hesitating whether to leave the room or to tarry in order to confer with others. I asked a gentleman who was then my associate, to speak to him; and, approaching him, he said: "My friend, are you a Christian?"

The old man said, "No, sir, I am not a Christian; but I want to be. I have been trying all my life to find out how to be a Christian, but I have not been able to receive any satisfaction in connection with my endeavors in that respect. I have been to church all my life, and read the Bible. I have attended meetings like these, and yet have received no light as to what I need to do in order to be a Christian. When Mr. Moody was here, several years ago, I attended almost all of his meetings, and talked with him and others personally, and when the meetings were done, I was as far away as ever. Now, I don't suppose it is of any use, but I would be very glad if you would tell me what I need to do in order that I might become a Christian.

My friend said to him: "Have you ever confessed Christ with your lips?"

The old man said. "No; I was waiting to become a Christian before I should do that."

My friend said to him: "That is just the way to become a Christian," and quoted a passage upon that point from the tenth chapter of Romans, and said: "I believe you need to commence to-night with an open acknowledgement of Christ as your Master."

The old man said: "It is too late to do it to-night, for the service has been dismissed."

My friend looked about the room where there may have been ten persons tarrying, and said: "Suppose you confess Christ to these people who are now in this room?"

After a moment's hesitation, the old man walked down the room and held out his hand to a gentleman whom he knew, and said: Mr. W——, I want to confess Christ to you;" and then went to others and said practically the same thing. I think I was the last one to whom he spoke that night, and I told him not to let the adversary make him think that he had not commenced the Christian life that night, but to count the matter settled, and to think of himself as a follower of Christ.

The next morning, when I came in for the ten o'clock service, the old gentleman was seated in the front seat, and with him was another man about seventy-five years of age. The first man came to me and said:

"I have brought a friend to the meeting this morning. He is a little hard of hearing. Will you please speak out so that he can hear, and be sure to say something about confessing Christ."

I said to him:

"Has the light come to you?"

And he said:

"Yes; and I want my friend here to confess Christ, too."

Before the day was done, the second old man had risen in the meeting to express his intention of being a follower of Christ, and after that it was a joy to see the two old men, side by side, with their faces beaming with the satisfaction that was brought to them by their new life. I believe that what God put first, we need to put first also, and that there is no greater aid to the faith of one who would be a disciple than open acknowledgment of his intention to be a follower of Christ.—Golden Rule.

Mr. Spurgeon on his own Funeral.

In Mr. Spurgeon's book called, "Trumpet Calls to Christian Energy," the following prophetic utterance cencerning his funeral will be found:—

"In a little while there will be a concourse of people in the streets. Methinks I hear someone inquiring, 'What are all these people waiting for? 'Do you not know? He is to be buried to-day.' 'And who is that?' 'It is Spurgeon.' 'What! the man that preached at the Tabernacle?' Yes; he is to be buried to-day.' That will happen very soon. And when you see my coffin carried to the silent grave, I should like every one of you, whether converted or not to be constrained to say, 'He did earnestly, in plain and simple language urge us not to put off the consideration of eternal things. He did entreat us to look to Christ. Now he is gone, our blood is not at his door if we perish.' God grant that you may not have to bear the bitter reproach of your own conscience."

A King's Heir.

Said the King of Belgium: "Yes, I will tell you how my interest in Africa began. I had only one son, my heir, the pride of my eyes, and he fell sick, and his sickness was unto death. It pleased God to take my darling boy to himself, and I was left alone. In my grief my thoughts were turned to that dark continent in which were millions orphaned and friendless. While I meditated God seemed to say to me, 'There is your child,' and I adopted Africa from that time, and whatever I can do to lift the burdens and let in the light upon the poor people of Africa that I will do. All my private revenue is devoted to that object, and I have provided that when I die Africa shall be my heir."

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS.

We rejoice with Brother Terry in the success reported in his letter of last week. Surely the Lord was in the movement. He endorses a dollar, which adds a new name to our list. He has been helping Brother Compton in a meeting at Zion.

Rev. J. W. Craig writes from Spokane: "I want to tell you how glad we have been made by the return of Brother P. M. Daniel, the recognized leader of our little band here, who has been absent for several months sojourning at Chicago."

It affords us great satisfaction to learn through Brother Fewel of the prospective early completion and dedication of that fine church in Eagle Valley. We have felt a deep interest in that work ever since we heard the speeches of Brothers Saunders and Crego at the district conference at Ingle's chapel two years ago. We believe the work is of the Lord, and will prosper.

We have received a "sample copy" of the "Oklahoma Christian Advocate," with the compliments of our beloved friend and brother, Rev.J.M. Gross, who has again been promoted (?) to the presiding eldership. The paper is a weekly at $1 a year. Revs W. Wimberly and C. P. Brewer are editors and publishers, and the place of publication is Guthrie, Oklahoma Territory. It will do much toward calling attention to that needy field,and greatly help in extending the Master's kingdom in that new land. We wish it great success.

We were just wondering what had become of our good Brother Barnhart, and feared that his removal to a more distant field had lessened his interest in the "Methodist", and were about sending a word of inquiry and exhortation. But this splendid report from Baker City speaks for itself. What a grand victory. It is worth a year of trial in the furnace. Our brother sends us a new subscriber, begs for extra copies to be distributed among the new converts to help in getting new subscribers. That is right. Get them to take the paper at once. It will help the pastor, help the young converts, and help the paper also. May the Lord continue to bless our brother in his glorious work.

Brother Skee makes us glad by the splendid report he sends from the Big Bend country. Everything seems to be on a "big" scale out there. Think of a circuit seventy-five miles across it, and yet a whole county just beyond without a preacher in it! But when they gain a victory the same rule holds good. A new preacher started out, a missionary debt (their portion of it), paid, a hundred dollars raised for the preacher, a good start made towards a new church, besides a number of happy conversions, shows that the militant host is going forth conquering and to conquer.

We rejoice to hear from our good Brother Hodge and to know that he is so pleasantly situated, and remembers the work in the Northwest where he and his excellent wife made many friends last year. May great success attend them.

Rev. W.O. Waggener writes in a private note concerning the meeting at Stevensville: We are still "holding the fort." A full house last night, with thermometer way below. Better attendance I never saw. There have been some 20 conversions and 12 have joined our church, with others yet to come in. The Sunday-school greatly improved. Do not know when will close. This cold weather is effecting my throat and lungs again. One penitent last night. By the way, you make me say in last "Methodist" that we have a "great" meeting. That is not my style of adjectives about anything I am engaged in. I wrote "good." Please correct it.

Revs. David H. Reid and Harrie A. Webb, evangelists, have just closed a meeting which they conducted for two weeks at the Presbyterian church in Corvallis.

They came at the solicitation of Rev. Mr. Hope, the pastor of that church here. While we confess to no predjudice hitherto in favor of professional evangelists, yet we believe these are devout Christian men and earnest and efficient workers in the Lord's vineyard. Mr. Reid is a Presbyterian, and has been a regular pastor in that church. He is a brother of the Presbyterian preacher at Great Falls, Mont. He is a native of Scotland. Mr. Webb is a native of England, is a Baptist somewhat after the Spurgeon school. He followed the stage for a number of years—captivated, he said, by the music of which he is a devout lover, and a talent for which he possesses in no ordinary degree. Both men are single, about 30 years of age, and of pleasing address. They are modest,unostentatious, avoid clap-trap, preach the straight, honest gospel truth in a manner that commands a respectful hearing and makes an abiding impression. Mr. Reid does most of the preaching and Mr. Webb the Bible reading, and exhortation, and much of the singing, for all of which he is eminently fitted. Mr. Webb has been in the evangelist work for three years, and labored for some time in Canada. Mr. Reid has been in the work only for one year, and they have been working together in Montana since last May, at Sand Coulee, Helena, Marysville, Kalispel and other places. So far as we can see they are clever, clean, consecrated men of God. With a little more of the Methodist fire and methods of work they would make more stir and secure greater visible results. Large congregations waited upon their ministry while here, the spiritual life of the community was quickened, and about half a dozen persons raised their hands in token of their decision to accept Christ as their Savior. They go from here to Missoula and from thence to Spokane, Washington, where they have engagements. May the Lord bless them in winning souls to Jesus Christ.

Brother Waggener expects to commence a protracted meeting at Corvallis as soon as he closes at Stevensville. May the Lord make it a time of great awakening and refreshing on account of his presence.

Brother Walton writes us that he has been afflicted with bronchitis. We trust that he has recovered ere this.

A new furnace has been placed in our church in Helena, which adds greatly to the comfort of the congregation. If stoves are a means of grace, furnaces are still more so; and with this new appliance as external aid to the redhot gospel that Brother Shaeffer preaches, (if the sermon we heard is a fair sample), we shall expect to hear of a general warming up in the church at the capital city at no distant day.

We had a little cold snap at last in Montana, and eighteen inches of snow which is worth many thousands of dollars to the agricultural, pastoral and mining interests of the state. The thermometer indicated 30 degrees below zero at Corvallis at one time, though there has been but little cessation of the ordinary winter work. Our people enjoy the cold weather more than the excessively warm temperature during the winter season, and it is more healthy.

Rev. J. H. Noland stopped over Sunday at Deer Lodge and preached for Brother Britt, and then proceeded on his way to Wallace, Idaho, since which time we have not heard from him. We hope to hear a good report soon. A different field is that from most that are found in South Carolina, but a pure gospel proclaimed by a plucky preacher wins its way in the West as well as elsewhere, in the long run. It shall not return void, is the promise of God. We may not expect always to revolutionize things in a day. If the Lord and his creatures have waited ten or twenty years for a preacher to come, the preacher can afford two wait a month or even a year for results. Only let us be strong and of a good courage to work and also to wait.

Quite a number have responded to Brother Bell's proposition and are doubling up by sending us additional names. One brother pays for ten papers, another for thirty, and others are at work soliciting new names for our list. This is something that all can do. Are there not a hundred little boys and girls who read the "Montana Methodist," who can, by interviewing their friends, send us at least one new subscriber each, with the money, one dollar in advance, for our paper? Let them do this for the love that they have for the Master and for his cause. Let all our friends rally to our help, make a united effort and double our list by next August.

We rejoice that Brother Compton is able to be at work again, though sorry that his affliction prevents his writing more. It seems a pity for so facile a pen to remain idle. But He knoweth and doeth all things for the best.

Montana's history as a state has been, in some respects, a checkered one. She bids fair to attain an unenviable notoriety by the scrambles of her sons for the chief seats at Washington. Two years ago there was a disgraceful and bitter struggle between the Republicans and Democrats over the senatorship, the Republicans gaining the prize in the end. Now there is a vacancy to be filled, and the Democrats control a majorityof the votes in the legislature, but they are divided and fighting each other to the bitter end. Mr. W. A. Clark, one of the pioneers of the country, and a self-made man, has a large majority of the votes of his party. But Mr . Daley, a very wealthy man, has a great dislike for Mr. Clark, and is supporting Mr. Dixon, the present congressman from the state, for the senatorship. The fight is so bitter and determined on both sides that it is doubtful if there will be any election of senator at this session. But the people's time and money are being spent all the same in the disgraceful row.

The Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church, South, for January, 1893, is on our table with a tempting table of contents, which we shall be pleased to notice more at large when we have more time to examine it. Every preacher and reading laymen,—the women included this time,ought to take this excellent periodical–only $2 a year.

HOW THE BATTLE IS GOING.

FROM BAKER CITY, OREGON.

Jan. 30th, 1893.

Dear "Montana Methodist:"—I here with submit my first report for your columns for this year. I came here from La Grande, crossing the mountains in wagons. We arrived here soon after conference, tired and somewhat discouraged because of our unsatisfactory service last year, but we found many earnest and willing hands to assist us. In consequence of arriving on Saturday night we could not go to house keeping at once. I wish all the careless housekeepers who are in the ministry could have seen the face of my tired wife, when she found all the parsonage floors, scrubbed clean,stoves blacked,and plenty of wood in, and even kindlings cut for the fire.May the rich blessings of heaven follow and rest upon my worthy predecessors, Bro. and Sister Kirk. We had good congregations from the first and have a good Sunday School. My wife organized a Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission society with 17 active members. They have placed in the treasury for local work fifty-six dollars; and the work is going on. We have a noble people to labor with and for. They have met all our wants and stand ready to dare and to do for God.

On the 7th of January we commenced our first series of revival meetings at Express, Or., and although we could get no ministerial aid, the Lord heard our cry and came to our help and has begotten for himself a great name. We had 34 conversions and 28 accessions to our church, and more to follow. We commence at Wingville,on the 12th of February. May the Lord bless, is our constant prayer. Our membership has doubled since we came here and many souls have been born into the Kingdom of our Lord. We hope to trebble it before conference.

Pray for us,
Henry Barnhart.

——

Palouse, Wash, Feb 3rd, 1893.

The "Montana Methodist" is a success in its new departure, that is in arriving weekly.

Whether it will be a success financially will depend on its supporters. Stir yourselves,brethren! Furnish copy and coin, Stanley will do the editing, all right; and the Pittsburgh publishers will get in first class typographical blunders. I wonder if Stanley doesn't feel sometimes, as Dr Lofferty says, like "falling upon the proofreader and smiting him hip and thigh!"

Well, the M. E. brethren at Spokane are about to start a paper. Perhaps they can compete for the publication of the "Methodist."

The news from Palouse circuit is not inspiring. The writer undertook to begin a protracted meeting at Palouse on New Year's day. Going into the pulpit at night sick, he fainted at the very commencement of the sermon and was sick for days afterward with what, if some one else, would have been nervous prostration. As, however, his wife says he has no nerves, his sickness had to have another name. The Dr. called it overwork.

The meeting was suspended. We hope to resume next Sunday, the 1st in Feb.

Our meeting at Zion was interrupted by the severe and stormy weather.

Bros. Swift and Terry were with me and preached to edification and profit.

The apparent results were not great, but the meeting was a success in that it stirred up the church and impressed the unconverted with wholesome truths which will yet produce fruit.

We have just lost two excellent members from Palouse. Bro. Billie Gray and wife have gone to Ill. on account of his wife's failing health. We regret to give them up. May her useful life be prolonged, if it is God's will!

J. W. Compton.

Hesseltine, Wash.

Dear Brother Stanley:—I should have written you sooner, but somehow this circuit and branch of mine keeps me busy. My circuit is now 75 miles long, and the call comes from the regions beyond, "come preach for us." If I had a thousand lives to spend on this earth I would want to spend them all preaching Christ to a hungry people. Northwest of me there is a country with something like 4,000 inhabitants without a minister in it to tell "the old, old story" that Jesus died to save. My heart aches when I see the fields white for the harvest and no laborers to garner in the sheaves.

I have been holding a meeting near Edwall, a new town on the Great Northern R. R. The people were in the spirit and we had seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Brother Majors is a new man amongst us, from down in the Southland, yet he is no "tender foot," nor did he come out here to teach us cow-boys how to preach. He told the simple story of the cross in a way that reached the hearts of men and drew them to him and then to Christ. Brother S. E. Emerson also rendered valuable assistance. He has been fighting the call to the ministry for ten years, but has now surrendered and taken up the cross. I received four into the church by baptism. Some others told me that they would come in at my next appointment.

We raised our part of the mission debt (that was good--Ed.) Brother Priest took up a collection of $100.00 for the preacher in charge, and Brother Edwall donated three lots 50x140 feet and started the subscription to build a church with $100.00. We added about $300 more, with as much more in sight. (That was a revival worth the same. But we would advise our brethren to secure all the subscriptions that are "in sight" at once. Strike while the iron is hot, for then is the only time to mold, weld and complete the work properly. Much has been lost by delays just at this stage—Editor.)

Altogether we had a very good round-up for the first of the season. We expect to have four more before spring. O, for more power to win men to God. I should like to be able to furnish Bishop Haygood with some specimens of religion to take to the World's Fair next fall. If I don't happen to capture any between now and spring. I know where he can get them. There was a young man converted at a camp-meeting we held on Rhea Creek. He came to the meeting that night, told us that he had religion and that it was the pure stuff. Our good Bishop might send and get a bushel or two, put it in a glass case and label, "Southern Methodism, handle with care." Bosh!

I did not intend to say anything about the "big show," but now that I have started in, I can't help saying that I think it reminds me of a man who was arrested for using strong language to an officer of the law. When he had paid his fine he asked the judge if a man could be punished for his thoughts. The judge answered. "No." "Well,then, your honor," he replied, "I think you are a bigger fool than the man who brought me here." So, I think if our chief pastors are as wise and as godly as I take them to be, to use a western phrase, "we will not be in it" next fall.

A. Y. Skee.

Willow Creek.

Dear Brother Stanley:—I thought a few lines from this part might be of interest to your readers. I am getting the "Montana Methodist" every week, and love to read it all through. I have been well acquainted with the editor for a long time and read all his letters. I am a member of the M. E.Church,South,at Willow Creek, and feel like sending a word of cheer. We are nearing the other shore. May we live nearer the cross and put our trust in Him who is able to keep us from all harm and give us life everlasting in the bright realms above. May each and every one do his whole duty for the advancement of Christ's kingdom. Let us as Christians pray for one another, for the day is fading fast and there is not a moment to lose. We ought to have our lamps trimmed and burning, ready to meet the Bridegroom when he cometh, for we know not the day nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh. May the editor and the little paper live long and do much good, is the prayer of T. J. Williams.

——

Pine Valley, Ore.

Dear Brother:—Enclosed find $2. for the splendid little "Methodist", one for renewal of my subscription and one for a new subscriber whose name I send.

Brother Crego and family are as well as usual and as lively as ever. Our fine church in Eagle Valley is fast nearing completion and the brethren are expecting to be able to dedicate it sometime next month.

Brother Yoakum and others are expecting to commence a meeting in this (Pine) valley in about a week. I hope much good will be done during the meeting, in the name of the blessed Savior. Success to the "Montana Methodist."

READING THE LAW.

Neh. VIII. 1-12.

BY AMOS R. WELLS.

EXPLANATORY NOTES.

THE BROAD PLACE BEFORE THE WATER GATE (v. 1). South of the temple, toward the brook Kidron, was an open space called Ophel, bored with cisterns and subterranean water-ways. Hence this gate, either in city-wall or temple wall, was called the water-gate.——THE BOOK (v. 1). Probably Ezra had by this time completed his collection of the sacred writings.——THE FIRST DAY (v. 2). The Feast of Trumpets. OF THE SEVENTH MONTH (v. 2). This began in September, and contained also a Day of Atonement and the Feast of the Tabernacles.——FROM THE MORNING UNTIL MIDDAY (v. 3). He was assisted, of course, by the others named. THE PEOPLE STOOD UP (v. 5). The Jewish custom was to rise during the reading of Scripture, and sit during the exposition ——CAUSED THE PEOPLE TO UNDERSTAND (v. 7). The language used may not have been the common Aramaic of the people, some of the words may have become unfamiliar, and the people had doubtless forgotten many of the circumstances that would add point to the sacred narrative.——THE TIRSHATHA (v. 9). The governor.

COMMENTS.

THE BOOK OF THE LAW (v. 1). Nehemiah had built the walls of Jerusalem, but he knew well that unless they were buttressed by other walls, the unseen walls of faith and spiritual knowledge, they would fall as if made of paper. Many a city and many a nation founded since has made the fatal mistake that Nehemiah avoided, has built upon earthly foundations, and not upon "the impregnable rock of holy Scripture."

BOTH OF MEN AND WOMEN (v. 2). People are surprised when they see a Sunday school largely attended by men and women. On the contrary they should be surprised to see a large attendance of children. One of the most severe comments on our church membership accessible to the sceptic—only he never thinks of it—is the fact that conversion, profession of Christ before men, assumption of active duties in the church and of the cares of mature life, so commonly coincide with secession from the Bible school. "The more men work, the more men eat," the sceptic might well argue; "therefore either your Bible is not food for the Christian life, or you are not working at your religion very hard." And the last guess of the sceptic would be about right.

FROM THE MORNING UNTIL MIDDAY (v. 3). We are likely to draw our thoughts regarding Bible study from the microscopic study of the schools and colleges, that takes up line by line, word by word by word, and gets through a page a day. There is need of such work in Bible study, but there is great need also of enlarged reading, a whole book at a sitting, as we would read thirty or forty pages of some fascinating secular author before laying down the volume. Were we to read as much only in our newspapers as many of us read daily in our Bibles, we should not even get through the headlines on the first page.

MATTITHIAH AND SHEMA, AND ANAIAH, AND.....(v. 4). What an array of names, men about whom we know nothing, save that they helped the great scribe. The Bible is full of such names, and there remains the vast host not even recorded by name, all of whom did something at some time, to help. In which company would we rather be? Before we answer, let us think of the Saviour's words about the "last" and the "first."

ALL THE PEOPLE STOOD UP (v. 5). This was to honor the Book. And when Ezra began to preach his sermons, they all sat down. A valuable lesson might be learned from this by all who, in modern times, doze through the Bible-reading, and rouse just in time to hear the sermon. Is not that to put man before God?

WORSHIPED THE LORD (v. 6). The secret of the failure of much Bible-study is that it is not prayed over. The Holy Spirit will guide us into all truth,—if we ask him, not unless.

CAUSED THE PEOPLE TO UNDERSTAND (v. 7). The Bible does not profit until it is understood, and it is only half-profitable when it is half-understood. Much of the sloth and lack of enthusiasm in Bible-study is due to a lack of a good commentary. Some read the Bible in course—an excellent plan, when carried out in the right way—merely for the sake of getting over the ground. They hurry over sentences that are meaningless to them, past allusions that have no point for them; they need a bookmark to keep their place; they do not know whether the scene of the history is in Europe or Asia or Africa, and when they are through they are no wiser than before they began; only, forsooth, they have "read the Bible," read it all!

DISTINCTLY (v. 8). A good reading to one's self, with proper emphasis, inflection, and pauses, is a wonderful help to a better understanding; and the better understanding, when you get it, is a wonderful help to a better reading.

ALL THE PEOPLE WEPT (v. 9). Bible-reading is worthless unless it touches life, unless it influences the conscience and the will. Days and months and years, and earnest effor in them to practice what the Bible preaches, are the best commentaries to be obtained.

THE JOY OF THE LORD IS YOUR STRENGTH (v. 10). There are few finer lines in the Holy Writ than that. How finely it distinguishes the joy of the Lord from the enfeebling joys of human contrivances! The Bible student never hesitates between the sham happiness that burns and the true happiness that builds.

TO SEND PORTIONS BECAUSE..... THEY HAD UNDERSTOOD (v. 12). A genuine Bible student is always unselfish. It is possible for a man to be wise in Bible lore, to know his Greek and Hebrew Testaments, the dates for all Bible events, the arguments for all doctrines, and yet be selfish; but he is not, for all his learning, a true Bible student. He has grasped at the form, and let the life escape him.—The Golden Rule.

——o——

Beware How Ye Walk.

Every man's thinking machine necessarily makes him walk close to great intellectual perils. It is a sad thing not to think. It is more awful to think. Emerson says: "Beware when God lets a thinker loose among men." I walked with a friend lately among electrical dynamos. One had to walk carefully. Beware how you touch this or that wheel. It is death-charged. The dynamos were lighting the city. But walking among the wheels was to be in deadly jeopardy. Thinking lights the world. And yet the thinking machine deals out equally light and death; use the machine rightly, it will flood your path with light; use it wrongly, it is a thunderbolt to smite you. It will strike you stone blind. When I see the skeptics sneering at a future life, I say to myself: "Poor fellows, God gave them dynamos to generate light to pierce through the grave. They have used them to make thunderbolts for their own destruction."

——o——

"Ask What ye Will."

If you have any trial which seems intolerable, pray—pray that it be relieved or changed. There is no harm in that. We may pray for anything not wrong in itself with perfect freedom, if we do not pray selfishly. One disabled from duty by sickness may pray for health that he may do his work; or one hemmed in by internal impediments may pray for utterance, that he may better serve the the truth and the right. Or, if he have a besetting sin, he may pray to be delivered from it, in order to serve God and man, and not be ourselves Satan's to mislead and destroy. But the answer to the prayer may be, as it was to Paul, not the removal of a thorn, but, instead, a growing insight into its meaning and value. The voice of God in our soul may show us, as we look up to him, that his strength is enough to enable us to bear it.—Rev. J. F. Clark, D. D.

——o——

Two mites was all the widow needed to show that she was the most liberal soul on earth.

The only true riches are those that death cannot take from us.

Praise Your Wife.

"A sunshiny husband makes a merry, beautiful home, worth having, worth working for. If a man is breezy, cheery, considerate and sympathetic, his wife sings in her heart over her puddings, and her mending basket, counts the hour till he returns at night, and renews her youth in the security she feels of his approbation and admiration. you may think it weak or childish, if you please, but it is the admired wife, who hears words of praise and receives smiles of commendation, who is capable, discreet and executive. I have seen a timid, meek, self-distrusting little body fairly bloom into strong, self-reliant womanhood, under the tonic and the cordial of companionship with a husband who really went out of his way to find occasion for showing her how fully he trusted her judgment, and how tenderly he deferred to her opinion. In home life there should be no jar, no striving for place, no insisting on prerogatives, or division of interest. The husband and the wife are each the complement of the other. And it is just as much his duty to be cheerful as it is hers to be patient; his right to bring joy into the door as it is hers to garnish the pleasant interior. A family where the daily walk of the father makes life a festival is filled with something like heavenly benediction."—Selected.

Christ in Sorrow.

Every great sorrow is in a certain sense a lonely sorrow. It drives a man into the fastnesses of himself. No friends, however near and dear, can quite penetrate to the sacred chamber of his grief. They may come so near that he can catch the sound of their footsteps and get a vague, sweet comfort out of the sense of their hovering presence; but none can enter and raise him up, whispering, "Peace, peace!" Only Christ can do that. He is the one Guest that can enter the sacred chamber of great sorrow. The soul's sense of loneliness yields to him. The heart's sensitive reserve gives way. Christ enters, and thenceforth sorrow takes on a new nameing and aspect. The blinding bereavement, the crushing loss or disappointment, the trial which has wrenched the very heartstrings asunder, the awful temptation which has swept the soul at last from its moorings—all these crises of life fall into harmony with the divine love and the divine purpose, when the Saviour enters the hidden chamber of our griefs. We never know what sorrow, means, or what it can do for the soul, till then. "Lo!" says Christ to the spirit brooding in lonely grief, "lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Blessed promise! Lord Jesus, come thou into all our sorrow burdened hearts; fill them with divine sympathy, and help us to learn through thy love the sacred meaning and meaning and uses of all life's dark and painful experiences!—James Buckham, in Sunday School Times.

J. B. Parnall:—Success to the "Montana Methodist," as a weekly. Long may it and its versatile editor live and prosper. After reading the contents of the numbers we have received to date we felt hungry for more of the same kind. Glad to learn of Brother Couey's whereabouts, and that he is so pleasantly situated in his new field. All the news concerning the old and the new workers in the Montana conference read is with interest.

Our second quarterly meeting has just been held. The presiding elder, Brother Shangle, was with us 6 days, preaching and looking after the various interests of the charge. He is a "hustler." The meeting lasted 10 days. Good was done, but there was no special move. One accession to the church, for which we thank God. A surprise party raided our house one evening after we had gone to church. You can judge our feelings on our return. An auxiliary of the Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission society organized with 13 members. We hope to get a suitable parsonage soon. Our health is fairly good.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TWO AND A HALF MILLIONS.

I have taken my pen to write about money, and something that is better. No doubt I shall have the reader's attention and interest, at least to begin with. Money has a wonderful power over the masses. There is an attraction in it, even for the children. It is next to omnipotent for good or evil, as it is rightly or wrongly used. Anybody who will, may accumulate wealth. Some more, some less. A poor man operating necessarily on a small capital, will accumulate a large fortune slowly, and after long years of patient waiting.

The poorest man in the country may lay up for himself a treasure of two and a half millions. It will require a capital of only one dollar, and any poor man can command that amount. One dollar at a comparatively low rate of compound interest in two hundred and fifty years will increase to two and a half million dollars.

"But I shall die and be forgotten," says the poor man, "before the time of my inheritance shall come. So you have only awakened a hope to crush it in the blooming." Hold, my friend, and hear what I have further to say. I am writing of material things, only that I may illustrate things that are spiritual and eternal.

Put one dollar into the treasury of the Lord, and the interest and increase will certainly be as much as in the ordinary trades and business of life. No one will object to this as a just and reasonable conclusion. Money invested in this way is perfectly safe, and the reward absolutely certain. That much cannot be said of any secular business or worldy enterprise. In the ordinary trades and business of life great labor and care are required to guard the capital, and to secure the increase against waste and violence. By fraud and other crimes, both are often injured or destroyed.

It is different where money is invested in the cause of God. The only thing is to make the offering in good faith, and God will care for the rest. He will defend the capital, compute the interest, and at the appointed time give you the increase or reward. This is true whether the outlay is in money or labor. No sacrifice made to God, can fail of a just and satisfactory recompense.

And there is this further motive in our service to the Lord, the increase goes on forever; not in dollars and cents, but in something infinitely better. The reward of the inheritance does not stop on reaching two and a half millions, but continues to increase with the rolling on, and on, of the endless cycles of eternity. If such is the recompense of one dollar, what must be the magnitude of the reward, where the whole life, and all its possessions are consecrated in service to God!

Some people seem to think that money given to God and the church, is just that much thrown away. But the facts show that no better use can be made of it. In this way an inheritance may be secured, "that no angel tongue can tell, nor angel's pen describe." In putting to record these great facts, I feel heartily ashamed of my own littleness, in the meager contributions I have made in the past to Christianity. Comparatively few man reach their millions in material wealth. And if they do, it is often by oppressing the poor. And at most they can enjoy it only for a few years. Not so with the Christian, for both his money and good deeds go to bless mankind. And this is still another motive in well doing. The man who does best for himself, secures the greatest possible good to others. Reader, remember that money put into the treasury of the Lord, is cumulative of an eternal weight of glory. Can you put it to a better use?

S. W. Cope.

From Green wood, S. C.

Dear Brother Stanley:—The "Montana Methodist" comes to me regularly, and we enjoy its visits very much. Reading the paper, I am carried back in thought, and sympathy to the noble band of heroes in the Northwest, with whom it was my privilege to be associated last year.

The work and the workers with you will always have a tender place in my heart. May the blessings of our Father which make rich, and add no sorrow, ever rest upon our preachers and their families there! They are heroes and heroines in the highest sense. And may He remember in mercy, and peace the kind people who hold up their hands! At the last session of the South Carolina Conference, Bishop Hendrix appointed me to this charge. One church in a flourishing town in upper South Carolina. We are comfortably situated in a seven room parsonage, and are serving a most thoughtful and kind people.

I shall not try to tell you all that they did for us before Mrs. Hodges came, nor of the many good things they left here the day she arrived. The ladies of the Parsonage Aid Society look after the comforts of the preacher's home. May their number be increased till there shall not be a charge in the whole church without such a society of consecrated women!

Surely the good women of all the charges in the church, if they once awake to a sense of their duty and privilege in this direction, will not longer leave their pastor without such timely help! There is scarcely a day that some one does not express their thoughtful kindness in a tangible way. Indeed it is a pleasure and a privilege to serve such a people! Our Sunday morning congregations number several hundred. Our average attendance at Sunday School is over one hundred and twenty. I have been here a little more than a month. Twelve have applied for church membership, and nine have come to us by letter. We have held no special services as yet. The pastor has paid about seventy-five visits. The members here are trying to build a new brick church in a more central part of the town, which when completed will be a gem of beauty and convenience; having Sunday School rooms and rooms for pastor's study and library. We hope to go into it in the spring. Pray for us. At present we worship in a brick church in a beautiful grove, but is too far from the masses of the people, hence the determination to build. May you be blessed in your work!

Sincerely Yours,
W. H. Hodges.

The man who will not give up his sin in this life will have to keep it in the next.

MISSIONARY DEBT.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Upon consultation, I find that the subscription to the debt, not paid before March 31st, will be too late to be included in the annual report.

If possible, please let your remittances be in the hands of T. B. Holt, Treasurer, by the 25th of March.

Over $120,000 have been subscribed, and pledged; $15,000 are now in hand, and $10,000 more in sight. Now is the time during the next eight weeks, for us as one man to roll off the burden of our Board of Missions.

Are we like the Son of Man, ready for either sacrifice or service?

Walter R. Lambuth,
Nashville, Tenn.

FROM BISHOP DUNCAN.

At its last session the Montana Conference reported all the assessments paid in full, with more than one dollar per member for Missions. That was an excellent record.

The Conference assumed the appointment of one hundred and seventy-four dollars as its part of the missionary debt and promised to have the amount in the hands of the treasurer of Mission Board before the close of the fiscal year.

This promise, I trust, the brethren will at once redeem. One hundred and twenty thousand dollars have been pledged for the payment of the debt. Fifteen thousand is in hand of that amount, and ten thousand in sight, so Dr. Lambuth reports. The whole sum is comparatively small and can easily be paid if we will make a persistent effort. I feel certain that the Montana brethren will at once see to it that the part of the debt expected from them, and the payment of which they have pledged, will be forwarded before the 25th of March at the very latest. It should be in Nashville if possible, by the 15th of March.

I need not exhort you brethren, for you cannot afford not to do now and in the future what you have faithfully done in the past, and that is promptly responding to all demands made upon your liberality when the board meets. Montana need not appear in the debt column with a deficit. As the time is short you cannot lose a day from this work, but act promptly and maintain your place at the head of the column. The payment of the debt means expansion and enlargement at home and abroad, whereever we are engaged in missionary work. It means more men and money for Montana where both are so sorely needed. My prayers are with you for the conversion of sinners and the edification of the church in your difficult but exceedingly important field.

W. W. Duncan.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, D. C., Jan. 31, 1893.

Butler, Lamar, Hayes, Brooks and Blaine have gone within a few days. It is rare that death cuts such a swath. Most of these men were familiar figures at the Capitol, and personal incidents and traits are recited on all hands, and though the majority of them in their lifetime excited fierce opposition, it is silent now and nought but good is heard of the dead. History has a place for each and will finally see that each has his place and to Blaine no doubt will be assigned, so far as temporal affairs are concerned, the loftiest place. He stands in one thing unique. He is the only man who ever twice refused a Presidential nomination that he would have had without the refusal.

Hawaii is knocking for admission to Uncle Sam's family circle or at least her dominant, intelligent, wealthy, business men, mostly Amercians, are seeking his protection. There is no clear unanimity of opinion as to what shall be done with the request. Some think we have territory and unassimilated population enough and are opposed to the acquisition of more territory and particularly that 3,500 miles away and peopled by Kanakas, Chinese and Japanese who they say are unfit to form a state or even to manage a territorial government. On the other hand it is said that the natives are intelligent Christians capable of self government; that we have encouraged our countrymen to develop the wealth of the island and invest their money there and that we owe them protection; that we can do there what England does in one way or another around the globe and what England may do in Hawaii if we do not. Further they say we need a station in the Pacific, and also a station in the West Indies for the defense of a ship canal across Central America and that we need the latter for the mutual defense of our eastern and western coasts. We need these to break the fortified circle which England is building around us and which she would be pleased to complete with Hawaii. Some assert it to be our destiny to absorb all the territory between the Arctic and the Carribean seas. As for the mode of government if the territorial form is not suitable, govern Hawaii by a commission. The District of Columbia, without a legislature, without a governor and without a voice affords an example. Let us, it is said, begin to resist the lightening band of England s circle of fortifications by taking Hawaii. Make it a Gibraltar of the Pacific. The New York Herald, Tribune, Sun, Times and Press say "open the door to Hawaii."

The Indian Territory is probably more difficult to manage in some respects than Hawaii would be. There are 120 deputy marshalls in the Fort Smith district embracing the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles and a part of the Chocktaws. These men make many arrests in the following order. First they "get the drop" with a Winchester; secondly put on the handcuffs; thirdly read the writ. Forty-six deputy marshalls were killed in six years in this district for trying to read the writ first. Here is a statement of account in one arrest: Mileage to the place of arrest, 6 cents per mile, $6.00. "Endeavoring to arrest," two days at $2 per day, $4.00 Serving writ, $2.00. Feeding prisoner two days, $1.50. Return mileage, prisoner and deputy, 10 cents per mile, $20.00. Commitment, $2.50. Attending before the commissioner, one day, $2 00. Subpoenaing four witnesses, $2.00. Total, $40.00. Of this one-fourth goes to the marshal. Bold, hardy men are required for this work and it is not singular that a story that one of the Dalton boys held the office should find credence.

The Prayer Closet.

After I became interested in religions (says the Rev. Asa Bullard in his autobiography), in seeking a place for retirement for my secret devotions, I thought of a large closet out of the spare chamber. That closet was the place where my mother kept her blankets, comforters and various kinds of bed-clothes. It was large, and without a window. When the door was shut, it was total darkness; no eye but that of Him who "seeth in secret," could behold any one who there sought retirement from the world. In that closet I erected my altar for secret prayer. It was my Bethel, and none but God can ever know the Bethel seasons I there enjoyed in communing with the Savior in that time of my first love, until I left my home to prepare for works of the Gospel ministry. In one of my visits to my dear old home, years after I had left it, as I was "company," I occupied at night the spare chamber. In the morning I had a desire to visit the dark closet; and see how it would seem to shut the door, and pray to my Father which is in secret, as I was wont to do in my young days. I opened the door, and what a scene greeted my eyes! There in the center of the closet stood a chair, and before that chair was a cushion, in which there were deep prints, where some one evidently was accustomed to kneel in secret worship. And who should it be? Who but my own blessed mother, who had prayed all her ten children into the kingdom? What a hallowed spot did it seem to me! A thrill of sacred awe came over me, and a voice almost seemed to say, as it did to Moses at the Burning Bush, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground."—Selected.

HEAVEN BEGUN.

It is said of an old Puritan that heaven was in him before he was in heaven. That is necessary for all of us; we must have heaven in us before we get into heaven. If we do not get to heaven before we die we shall never get there afterward. An old Scotchman was asked whether he ever expected to go to heaven. "Why, man, I live there," was his quaint reply. Let us all live in those spiritual things which are the essential features of heaven. Often go there before you go to stay there. If you come down to-morrow morning, knowing and realizing that heaven is yours, and that you will soon be there, those children will not worry you half so much. When you go to your business or to your work you will not be half so discontented when you know that this is not your rest, but that you have a rest on the hills eternal, whither your heart has already gone, and that there your portion is in the everlasting dwellings. "Lay hold on eternal life." "Get a hold on it now." It is a thing of the future, and it is a thing of the present; and even your part of it that is future can be, by faith, so realized and grasped as to be actually enjoyed while you are yet here.—C. H. Spurgeon.

GOOD ADVICE.

A father who tenderly loved his son, one day gave him some excellent advice, designed to govern his his course in life. He said: "My son, in pursuing your course in the world, you will find many things which you cannot understand. You would like to understand them, but it is impossible. There is no use for you to tsx your brain to explain them. Just throw them in a heap by themselves. Call it a heap of 'INEXPLICABLES,' and and go on your way.

"Then again, you will come across things which are manifestly wrong, but they are beyond remedy. It is useless for you to try to find a cure—it is not in reach. So you must throw them in another heap, and call it a heap of INCURABLES, and pursue your course."

That old father gave good advice to his son. Let us so deal with the INEXPLICABLES and INCURABLES.—Selected.

Christ's Standard of a Christian.

"If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him." (John 14:23.)

This is a clear statement of the fact that fidelity in the first stages of religious life will be followed by more marvelous displays of saving power and interior workings of the Three in One. Let us, then, examine the Savior's notions concerning a justified Christian.

"If a man love me, he will keep my words," embodies the Savior's views of a true believer; he loves God and keeps His commandments. Whatever may be done or not done at conversion, the carnal mind, which is enmity against God, and not subject to His law, is so far depressed [destroyed] that the happy subject of the change loves and obeys God. The Savior's teaching, then, is,

1. A justified Christian loves God. Death in trespasses and sins has been displaced by a spiritual life which shows itself in love, peace, joy, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, etc. He delights in God, in his law, in his house, in his worship and in his work. "His delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night."

It is the nature of this love for God to awaken sympathy and affection for all God's creatures, and especially for mankind. Hence a true Christian is kind to his fellows, bearing patiently, and for a long time, the injuries or wrongs which their weaknesses or sins may inflict. He does not envy any one his prosperity, usefulness or honor, but is pleased at the success of all in every legitimate enterprise. He makes all due effort consistent with his obligations to himself and his dependents, to aid all persons, even his enemies, in their laudable undertakings. "Charity seeketh not her own." Such a person is "a new creature in Christ Jesus; old things have passed away; behold, all things have become new." * * *

2. A justified Christian obeys God. "He will," says Jesus, "keep my words;" he studies them, keeps them in memory, and obeys them. He is a person of prayer and Christian work; he leaves nothing undone which he thinks he ought to do, and thereby keeps a conscience void of offense against God. He walks abreast of his light, realizing that "there is no condemnation to them which are in Christ, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."

It is a fearful mistake to suppose that the initial Christian life allows any act which contracts guilt; and it is painful to think how common it is in these days to hear professors of religion confess that they do many things which they ought not to do; that they make many crooked paths, and that they feel guilt and condemnation as the result. And with all this, they view themselves as justified believers, and ask their brethren to pray for them that they may prove faithful, and at last get to heaven! Faithfulness in such a course will certainly end in the eternal loss of the soul! The plain statement of Christ is "If a man love me, he will keep my words." Love and obedience are the inseparable marks of a justified Christian; and fidelity in this relation is succeeded, sooner or later, in every case, by deeper and sweeter intimacies with the adorable Trinity.—Sheridan Baker.

About the Theatre.

Dr. Theodore Cuyler, in response to a question as to what he thought of the theatre, said in the "New York Mail and Express:"

"You must take the average stage as it is, and not as you would like to have it. It is an institution which, if you patronize, you become morally responsible for, as much as if you were to patronize a public library, or a public drinking saloon. As an institution it habitually unsexes woman by parading her before a mixed audience in man's attire. Too often it exposes her in such a pitiable scantiness of any attire at all, that if you saw your own sister in such a plight, you would turn your eyes in horror. Yet you propose to pay your money (through the box office) to somebody else's sisters and daughters to violate womanly delicacy for your entertainment. If the daughter of Herodias dances to please you, then you are responsible for the dance, both in its influence on the dancer and on your own moral sense. There is no evading before God, your accountability for the theatre, if you habitually support it.

"Another peril of the theatre arises from the fascination which it too often engenders. Like wine drinking, it becomes an appetite. To gratify this growing passion for the play-house, tens of thousands of young people squander their money and their time. Other and purer recreations become tame and insipid. Wholesome pleasures cease to please, just as a brandy drinker ceases to be satisfied with cold water. It is not recreation, but stimulation too, that you will be after when you become enslaved by the fascination of the stage.

My young friends, be assured that no sagacious employer ever chooses a clerk or accountant or any other employee the sooner because he is a theatre goer. No sensible man is apt to select the companion of his heart and home because she is a frequenter of a play-house. No good woman wants her sons and daughters there. No pastor expects that his youthful church members can go into that impure atmosphere without a terrible damage to their piety. I don't believe that the theatre has ever helped many souls toward heaven. I know that it has sent thousands to perdition. Now that I have, in kind and candid plainness of speech, pointed out some of the inevitable perils of the play-house, do you feel like taking the risk?"

NIGHT PILGRIMS.

"Faint and afar, behold a star;
And by its fadeless ray enticed,
O'er barren sands I stretch my hands
To touch the garment of the Christ."

Throughout the length and breadth of the land they are scattered—men and women whose half open spiritual eyes see men as trees walking; men and women whose clouded souls hunger and thirst after righteousness, even the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ, and find it not in measures that fully satisfy. They long to have him revealed to them in all His beauty, the chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely; but there are barriers—stubborn, stony barriers, which hinder Him from coming in and supping with them in sweet and holy communion. There are besetting mountains of unbelief which will not down for all the preaching of all the preachers, nor all the writings of all the apostles. They feel within their very souls that they have and desire no fellowship with sin, and yet the sacred cross is they fear only a "mental image" to them. They scorn to anchor upon any foundation save Christ for rest and peace, and yet it seems that the peace which passeth understanding to them is denied. And so not satisfied with the feeble embers of hope which smoulder within them, refusing at all times to to kindle to a flame, they stretch their hands and plead for more light. Shorn lambs to whom it has not pleased the Lord to temper the winds, through "doubt's dim twilight" they seek a better country, that is, a heavenly.

Christian reader, strong in faith and hope and love, pray for the poor night pilgrims, that the Lord may hasten his time of refreshing, and comfort them with songs in the night.—James W. Phillips, in Christian at Work.

"What Doest Thou For Me?"

One of the most attractive characters in all the history of missions is that of Count Zinzendorf, the Moravian hero, who poured out his wealth and gave the service of his lifetime gladly that the Gospel of Christ might be preached and his kingdom extended among men.

The familiar story of his consecration of life and possessions has in it an unmistakable lesson. He was one day standing in a famous picture gallery at Dusseldorf when his eye fell upon a noble painting, representing the Son of man, in all the agony of his sacrifice, crowned with thorns, and with bleeding hands and side. And written upon this picture was this inscription: "All this I did for thee; what doest thou for me?" This rich nobleman stood transfixed. He saw the littleness and baseness of a selfish life, as contrasted with the immeasurable greatness of the divine love, and from the picture gallery he went out that day to a life of burning zeal and sublime heroism, and to say henceforth, "I have but one passion, and that is He—only He!"

Religious Intelligence.

The Methodist Episcopal church has 3,795 members in Japan.

There are 380 Bible women taking the Scriptures into the Zennas of India.

In Methodist Sunday schools during the past year there were 130,000 conversions.

The Canada Presbyterian church requires a year's probation from ministers coming from other denominations.

Recent revival services at fifty-six points throughout the United States, under the United Brethren in Christ, have resulted in 1,723 conversions.

The Lutheran church in America sustains 818 home missionaries and assists 2,353 mission congregations, with a membership of 114,745, at an expenditure of $282,059.

Mr. A. H. Massey, a layman of the Methodist church of Canada, has contributed $40,000 for the endowment of a theological chair in Victoria University, Toronto.

The religious census of New Zealand, whose population is 626,658, returns English Episcopalians at 253, 331, Presbyterians at 141,477, Roman Catholics at 87,478, and Baptists at 14,825.

Rev. Dr. Matthews says that in the Presbyterian churches in Holland it is the rule for a man when he begins to be sleepy in church, to rise and stand until he gets wide awake again. It is not an unusual sight to see a dozen or more men standing at the same time.

In a recent Sunday service at Dayton, Ohio, 230 young men and young women accepted Christ and designated the churches they desired to join. The meeting was in charge of Dr. Munhall, who is conducting a series of remarkably successful meetings at the the Third Street Presbyterian church in Dayton.

Wise Words.

A wise man understands a good work from the beginning, but a fool only when it comes to an end. Seek the counsel of wise and sensible men, of learned men, of intelligent men, and of men of good disposition, and be thou their friend. Keep thy hands from stealing, thy feet from wandering without work, and thy mind from cherishing wicked revenge; for the man who works righteousness obtains a good reward, and the man who does sin suffers punishment. Do not injure thy soul by wrath and envy. Do not consign thy soul to hell out of a false modesty or shame. Ask God's blessing and keep thy heart cheerful, and thou shalt obtain of the Lord an increase of his goodness. Always, and at every time, trust thou in God alone, and make that beloved to thyself which is increasing and profitable unto thee. Labor and sacrifice thy life for the thing which is of God. Meditate on virtue; do not meditate on sin; for man does not live forever, therefore the thing which concerns heaven is most befitting thee.—From a Parsee Writer of the Fourth Century.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Bishop Duncan feels and expresses a special interest in our work in Montana. In a private note he says: "I hope that the friends will see to it that Montana shows no deficit in the debt column when the board meets. I enjoy the "Montana Methodist" very much, a very readable paper to me. Trust that the friends and brethren around Corvallis are rejoicing in successful work." We appreciate the Bishop's and also Brother Lambuth's interest in us, but we think they need have no fears about Montana falling behind in the payment of her share of the Missionary debt. Our people are in the habit of paying what they promise, especially to Missions and Church Extension.

It is with much regret that we learn of the return of our dear brother, Rev. J. W. Robertson, of Genesee, to Tennessee. He is a superannuated member of the Holston conference, but came West seeking health, and seeing the great need of laborers he took work in the East Columbia Conference, where his labors have been greatly blessed in building up the church. He is a modest, sweet spirited Christian gentleman, and we pray the blessing of God upon him in the midst of his affliction. While not in the active work he can and will pray and cheer the hearts of those who are called to stand in the front of the battle. We shall expect to hear from him again. Who will fill the place made vacant by his departure?

The body of Mrs. Mary Allen West has been brought home from Japan, and interred at her home in Galesburg, Ill. The influence of her work in behalf of temperance in her Sunrise Empire will endure for many decades.

An exchange says there are 330 packs of hounds kept in England and Ireland, the annual cost of keeping which is estimated at $22,500,000. It would seem that many of the aristocrats are fast going to the dogs or after them. How many thousands of poor people would that amount feed and clothe. What a wonderful impetus even half this amount would give to Gen. Booth's work of rescuing the "submerged tenth." But too many people, alas, think far more of a dog or a horse than they do of a man.

In a private note, Rev. Sam M. Chase writes from Ventura, Cal. "Am trying to turn the world up side down to build a parsonage. Praise the Lord, I'm going to succeed. Am praying and hoping and working to keep up a revival 365 days in the year." [That is on the right line. Hope you will succeed.—Editor.] "God is helping me, and the work goes on. If I can keep my own heart full of spiritual life and fire, other things will move. God bless you brave soldiers on Montana's frontier. Love Squires for me. The Lord bless that good man.

Then deadlock in the Montana legislature, over the election of a U. S. Senator still continues. We feel zealous for the good name of our great state, and we cannot but regard such a war among politicians as exceedingly unfortunate. Two years ago the fight was between Republicans and Democrats, but this time the Democrats are devouring each other. The session is half over, and but little has been accomplished. The people are getting tired of such foolishness, and are loud in their demand for majority rule.

We have had some pretty cold weather in some portions of the state, but it was of short duration, and, in Western Montana, at least, it is regarded as a very fine winter.

The Hawaian question has been the sensation of the country for several weeks. The islands would be very desirable for us as a strategy point, and we should see to it that no other great power gets possession of them. But the character of the population and the unsettled condition of affairs here cause thoughtful men to think soberly before they shout for annexation. Still annexation will come sooner or later.

The preacher who habitually uses the Sunday train to go to or from an appointment becomes a party to the public desecration of the day, and his practice will counteract the influence of the strongest sermon he might preach in defense of the fourth commandment. We are in an enemy's country. Let us give none occasion to the adversary.

Let us not give up the time-honored custom of having preaching at eleven o'clock on Saturday, as well as on Sunday at our quarterly meetings. If the city churches do ignore it, let the country people cling to the old rule. Teach the people that it is their duty to come to the day meeting on Saturday. Some of the most profitable services that we ever attended were at this hour. It will help greatly to preserve the prestige of the quarterly meeting occasion, and save the institution from threatened demoralization. Let our preachers and people make it a point to be present and hear the presiding elder's Saturday morning sermon. It not only concentrates the forces at the commencement of the battle, but it warms their hearts, thrills and inspires them for better service in all the after devotional exercises of the meeting.

We rejoice with Brother Eakin in the progress of our cause in and about Lewiston. Doubtless there has been a great change for the better in that region within the past three years. May our brother be abundantly blessed in the new sphere in which he is called to labor.

There is much in Brother Payton Smith's letter of thrilling interest to us. The first recollections of our childhood date back to his home and to the old chapel that he speaks of, which our father was then building with his own hands. Our precious dead-four little mates who were taken from our home in early childhood, are buried in the cemetery there. Many precious memories cluster around that spot of ground. We rejoice that religion still thrives there, in the revival, in the Sunday school and in the new house May the glory of the latter house. exceed that of the former, and may our dear brother Smith, whom we love next to our own father, when his work is ended, have a happy and abundant entrance into that house above not made with hands, the building of God eternal in the heavens.

"Oh, what a glorious hope is ours!
While here on earth we stay,
We more than taste the heavenly powers,
And antedate that day.

We feel the resurrection near,
Our life in Christ concealed,
And with His glorious presence here
Our earthen vessels filled."

Labor and Sunday Closing.

Working men in various places are manifesting an active interest in the enforcement of the Sunday closing laws. There are many towns and small cities where the barbers have combined against working on the Sabbath. In Chicago the clerks of butchers, clothing houses and retail grocers, have almost succeeded in an earnest movement for Sunday closing. In New Orleans, a campaign for the enforcement of an existing Sunday-closing law is now in progress. The law has been set at nought by the saloon-keepers. The American Confederation of Labor has entered into an alliance with the Sunday Rest League to secure its enforcement, and it is believed that the opposition must give way.

Labor is beginning to realize that one of its most important rights is the right to have a day of rest. The Sabbath was made for man.

If you would increase your happiness and promote your life, forget your neighbors' faults. Forget the slander you have heard. Forget the temptations. Forget the fault finding, and give little thought to the cause which provoked it. Forget the peculiarities of your friends, and only remember the good points which make you fond of them. Forget all personal quarrels of histories you may have heard by accident, and which, if repeated, would seem a thousand times worse than they are. Obliterate everything disagreeable from yesterday; start out with a clean sheet for to-day, and write upon it, for sweet memory's sake, only those things which are lovely and lovable. —Lutheran Observer.

STRONG DRINK.

By strong drink we mean anything that will intoxicate. It is said, and truthfully too, that the history of strong drink is the history of mind, of tears, of bloodshed. It is, no doubt, the greatest curse that has ever been brought upon the human race. Strong drink has sent many a poor soul to a drunkard's grave and a drunkard's hell. We should beware of the first drop, for it will lead us astray. "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise," is the Word of God. It is Alexander the Great, who is honored among the greatest of warriors. But it is said that Alexander the Great was destined to owe his destruction to the wine-cup; while drinking at a banquet in Babylon, he was suddenly taken sick, and death conquered the conqueror, at the age of 33 years. Thus was he cut off in the vigor of early manhood. Men may talk of earthquakes, storms, conflagrations, famines and of war. But strong drink has sent a volume of misery and woe into the stream of of this world's history more fearful and terrible than any of them.

Strong drink is a giant demon of destruction. It is an evil which is limited to no age, no continent, no nation, no party, no sex, no period of life. Strong drink has taken the poor man at his toil, the rich man at his desk, the senator in the halls of state, the drayman on the street, the young man in his festivities, the old man in his repose, and plunged them into awful ruin. Strong drink! When we look upon the widespread desolation brought about by strong drink we stand in awe and cry, human strength is insufficient to restore the ruined homes and bring joy to the bereft hearts. God made man in his own image; but how fallen is man? God never created man for a drunkard's grave and a drunkard's hell. Strong drink has raged equally in times of war, and in times of peace, in the periods of depression, and in periods of prosperity, in republics and in monarchies, among the civilized and among the savages.

It is said Egypt, the source of science, Babylon, the wonder and glory of the world, Greece, the home of learning and of liberty, Rome, the mistress of the earth. Each in their turn had their heart lacerated by this dreadful canker-worm, and thus became an easy prey to the destroyer. It has drained tears enough to make a sea, expended treasures enough to supply every heathen land with missionaries, shed blood enough to redden the waves of every ocean. Some of the mightiest intellects, some of the most generous natures, some of the happiest homes, some of the noblest specimens of manhood and womanhood, it has blighted and crushed and buried in wretchedness. It has filled our penitentiaries, jails, asylums and alms-houses with thieves, murderers, lunatics and paupers. Oh, could we but sweep away forever, all the results of this one form of sin. Then would the children of haggard and want sit in the halls of plenty. The tears of orphanage and widowhood and disappointed hope would dwindle in a goodly measure. Disease would be robbed of much of its power. The clouds would vanish from thousands of ruined and afflicted homes, and peace breathe its fragrance on the world almost as if the day of its redemption had come.

Oh, what will we do, Christian friends? Stand aside and let this hellish thing be carried on? Close our ears and fold our hands in idleness and see our friends and neighbors, father, mother, brother, sister, yea, and our children go down to eternal night and ruin? I say will we stand by and listen to the pitiful cries and sobs of mothers and children, whose homes have been robbed of pleasure and happiness by strong drink? I plead with you dear friends, in behalf of enslaved humanity, in behalf of outraged society, in behalf of diseased bodies and minds, in behalf of broken hearts and ruined homes, in behalf of the church which is so sorely afflicted by this evil, strong drink. Yea, I plead with every Christian man, woman and child to live and pray, and work for the utter destruction of this monster evil which seeks to lay its crimson hands upon the dearest interest of our homes, and tear from our bosoms those whom we dearly love and honor? May God hasten the day, nay, may we by the help of God seek to hasten the time when this monster enemy of God and Adam's race shall be completely overthrown, and sinful, enslaved suffering humanity brought to the enjoyments of full liberty and permanent victory. May God bless every effort put forth for its overthrow. Come every one and help to unfurl the banner and fling it to the breeze, and let the glad hosanna sweep over land and sea. Come and stand by those who cared for us in our tender years, who used to press us to their breast and place upon our lips a mother's kiss. May not their gray hairs go down in sorrow to the grave on the account of drunken sons and daughters. But may we help to strew their paths with roses bright, and then in that last trying hour when they are about to change time for eternity, they can say all is well. I have seen my children breast the gale and stand the storm. Oh, my soul is full of glory. But now my latest sun is sinking fast. My race is nearly run, my strongest trials past, my triumph is begun.

Missionary Notes.

BY ROBERT E. SPEER.

The Rev. E. P. Scott, a missionary in India, saw, one day, in the street of the city where he was working, a queer looking man, who had come down from some mountain village. Upon inquiry Mr. Scott found that the people of that place had never heard the gospel, and he made up his mind to go to carry it to them. His friends tried to dissuade him from his purpose and told him that he would never come back. But he took his violin and started bravely off. As he entered the village he was at once surrounded by natives, and a dozen spears were pointed at his heart. Still he did not quail, but closing his eyes lest the cruel faces so near his own should shake his courage, he began to play upon his violin the old hymn, "All hail the power of Jesus' name." As the sweet notes fell upon the air, there was a sudden hush about him and he wondered what had happened to his savage companions, but he did not pause until his arm was too tired to move the bow any longer. Then glancing up he saw that the men were standing motionless around him, and that tears were on many of the dusky cheeks. The power of that wonderful Name had made itself felt through the music, and awed them into silence. There was no further opposition to the messenger of good tidings. Mr. Scott lived with these people for two years and a half teaching them from the Bible and helping them in many ways. At the end of that time he was obliged to leave them because his health was failing, but the inhabitants of the village went as far as possible with him on his journey, saying over and over, "Oh, Missionary, do come back to us soon; there are tribes beyond us who must hear your story, too."

Many years ago in Scotland a little boy went, one day, to a missionary meeting, where he was so much interested in what he heard about the people in other countries who knew nothing of the Father in heaven and of the message He has sent to the world by His Son, that his heart was deeply stirred, and he determined that if he should live to grow up he would be a missionary and go himself to the heathen and tell them about Jesus Christ. When the meeting was about to close there was a notice given that a collection would be taken at the door. Now the boy had not a cent in his pocket and he was ashamed to go out and not make any contribution, he hung behind the rest of the people hoping that the collectors would do their work and depart before he should appear. But as he was stealing towards the door, one of the men heard him, and turning back held the plate towards him. The boy stood still for a moment and looked at the man, and then said quietly: "Please hold it a little lower, sir." The man complied with the request. "Lower, still, sir," said the boy again. Again the man did as requested, half amused, half curious. "You'd better put it on the ground," persisted the boy, and when this direction was followed, he stepped into the plate and glanced up with a smile, "It's all I have to give, sir," he said, "but if God will let me I will be a missionary some day."

And there was nobody in all the church that day who gave so much as the little lad with nothing in his pockets.

One fourth of the people of Africa are Mohammedans, and nearly three fourths are pagans.

The contributions of the native Christians connected with the Foreign Missions of our church averaged in 1890 $1.75 for each church member.

The wages of a Japanese are rarely more than 10 cents a day, but last year the converts gave $27,000 for mission purposes.

One-third of the people inhabiting the Congo basin are cannibals. The Bangola believe that the bravery and other qualities of a victim are imparted to those who eat his flesh.

There are 330 Bible women taking the Scriptures into the zenanes of India.

At the beginning of this century the Bible was accessible to but one-fifth of the population of the world. Now it has been translated into so many languages that it may be read by nine-tenths of the people of the globe.

The number of Protestant missionaries in the world is about 6,000, one to 166,000 of the unevangelized.

Afghanistan has 6,000,000 people and no missionary; Annam has 5,000,000, and only Roman Catholic missionaries; India has only one missionary to 275,000 people; Persia, one to 300,000; Thibet, one to 2,000,000. If 40,000 missionaries were sent to India there would still be one to every 50,000. Yet the work in India is so encouraging that there have been from 25,000 to 40,000 converts there this year. In Japan 400 people are baptized every month.

In Persia from Karachi to Bagdad, among the populous villages of the Persian Gulf, of the Tigris and Euphrates, throughout Arabia and Southwest Persia, there is not a missionary, and from Bagdad to Teheran, not a missionary. The great oasis with 680 mountain villages craving medical advice is never visited.

Whatever shall appear to be God's will, that will I do.—Lincoln.

Tidings From the Field.

BOULDER.

R. S. Clark:—We had to stop our protracted meeting at Alhambra on account of the severe cold weather. We received two into the church, both heads of families. We have received in all seven since conference. We now think of commencing a meeting at Boulder next Monday night, assisted by Brother Shaeffer, of Helena. We have reached a religious crisis in Boulder, and if God's people will come up to his help against the mighty, the type of religious life will be raised; if not, then it will sink to a lower plane. "The gospel"—when its claims are faithfully urged—"will prove a savor of life unto life or of death unto death." Under such an administration of the gospel those that do not work up into a higher type of spiritual life will certainly be worked down into a lifeless state where their light is darkness. May God save the church in Boulder from this latter state, is the prayer of one who has sought better things for her.

WATERVILLE CIRCUIT, KAN.

J. T. Smith:—Having been changed to the Waterville circuit by the presiding elder, T. C. Downs. I desire that you change my paper from Effingham, Kan., to Winklers Mills, Kan. This leaves me and my colleague, Rev. D. E. Bundy, in a glorious revival on our new work. Several have already professed faith in God and several are stil at the altar. We give God the glory.

GENESEE, IDAHO.

Rev. J. W. Robertson:— My health is so poor that I am unable to do active pastoral work, and I return to my own conference. My post-office will be Jasper, East Tennessee. We have had fine success here at Genesee, building a new church and parsonage, and adding 23 members to our roll since conference at Palouse City. I leave very regretfully a noble people and a very promising field for our church. I love your paper and the great West, and shall pray and do all I can for them. I will write to you from Tennessee. [We hope you will.—Editor.]

LELAND CIRCUIT, WASH.

Rev. W. S. Hornbuckle is pressing the battle, and most successfully too. We rejoice with him. He says on a postal: "I am away up here in the timber engaged in a gracious revival, and the Lord is with us. Seven conversions up to date, and all have joined our church, which makes 25 since conference, and others under conviction.

STEVENSVILLE AND CORVALLIS.

Rev. W. O. Waggener recently made Corvallis a flying visit and filled his regular appointment here on the second Sunday in February. He looks hale and hearty as ever, though he says that the constant pulpit labor and the cold weather have materially affected his health. The meeting at Stevensville still continues with full houses and unabated interest. About 2 conversions and 17 accessions to our church up to the present writing. He will commence a meeting at Corvallis on the 4th Sunday in February. May it prove to be a time of great awakening and spiritual refreshing. Sister B. S. Chaffin, of Corvallis, has lately been dangerously ill. At this writing she is better, and hopes are entained for her recovery, for which we are devoutly thankful.

UPPER BITTER ROOT NOTES.

The editor preached at Darby school house, which is 23 miles south of Corvallis, up the valley, the second Sunday of this month. There was a good congregation of attentive hearers present. A union Sunday-school is in progress, superintended by a Brother Tabor. Many inquiries were made as to when Brother Flowers will return. There is a promising field in this section. The people are glad to hear the gospel. The woods are full of men engaged in logging—cutting saw-logs and dumping them into the river to await the spring rise to float them down to the immense pond at Hamilton. They are at work away up on the West Fork. One man has a contract for putting in twelve million feet, another eight million, another three million, and so on. This gives the reader some idea of the extent of the business. This timber will be sawed at Hamilton next summer. The industry has given the farmers of this section a fine market for their produce the past season. An old fashioned Methodist revival at Darby would accomplish wonders for that region. Why not have it? Let the preacher in charge and presiding elder answer.

FROM LEWISTON, IDAHO.

Dear Brother Stanley:—I will give you a few items which may be of interest to your readers, as I have not seen anything in your columns lately from this corner. Brethren, we are, by the grace of God, still alive spiritually, and on the forward march, and I pray God that we may all reach that golden shore by and by.

Our pastor, Rev. W. B. Taylor, arrived some two months ago from the Tennessee conference, and has begun work in earnest. He has organized a class in Lewiston. Many the little vine be watered from the dews of heaven, grow and bear much fruit, and be the means of bringing many workers into the vineyard.

Brother Swift was with us at Upper Tammany in our quarterly meeting the third Sunday, and Saturday before, in January. He came with glad tidings of great joy. The meeting was continued the following week by our pastor, and resulted in four additions, and the church was much revived. This scribe was licensed to exhort. I am glad to say that we have a nice comfortable church here in Tammany, and it is paid for. I enclose one dollar to renew my subscription, which expires next June, and if the editor will meet me at the next district conference at Genesee I will pay him for another year's subscription. We would all be very glad to see you there. (We would be very happy to go, and will do so, if possible. — Editor.) Your paper has always been a welcome visitor in our home, and is doubly so now since it has got to be a weekly. It always sends a thrill of joy and gladness through my soul when I read it and see the accounts of the progress of the work in this sparsely settled Northwest, where there are so many obstacles and difficulties to be overcome. But amid all we are still advancing, and by and by we shall reap if we faint not.

W. J. Eakin.

FROM BROTHER STATELER.

A private note from Brother Stateler says: You enquire concerning my health and circumstances. Well, I got along quite well through the fall, but allowed myself to be over worked–preaching often, and twice a day frequently. Took a cold about Christmas and have not been well since. I am hoping through the mercy of God to recover sufficiently to be of some use again before I go hence. My constant business now is to strive to be ready to depart. I am contemplating a glorious meeting shortly on the other shore with "our loved and best"—not lost, but gone before. What a meeting that will be! Brother and Sister S. meet me there. God give us victory at last. Amen.

I have been at home a month, trying to take care of myself. To me it is very lonely, though I have plenty of company — the same family who have been with me for three years.

We have had a week of very cold weather. The last night of January the thermometer registered 40 below zero. We have about 4 inches of snow.

FROM RICHMOND, MO.

Dear Brother Stanley:—Your kind notice, informing me that I am behind on my subscription to the "Montana Methodist," is at hand. I thank you for it, as I did not know when my time was out. I send you three dollars, which will pay for the paper to February, 1895, according to your notice, at which time you will please stop it. Of course I do not expect to live that long, but I do this to help you and the West. You are making a good and useful paper. I pray God to bless you and all of our men out there in your work and labor of love for the cause.

We have been rebuilding and renovating our old chuch the last summer and fall. We raised the wall three feet higher, making an arch ceiling 17 feet high in the center, with a square-pitch self supporting roof, and all new windows and new weather-boarding. We have also built a class-room on the side 12x20 feet, the same height as the main building. It is painted white and all looks well. It cost $520. We aim to have Bishop Hendrix dedicate it sometime in April.

Brothers J. P. Godbey and Sanderson had a good meeting this winter. There were about 20 conversions, and 16 joined our church, all young people who I hope will be faithful and fill up the places of the old ones as they drop out.

We keep up our Thursday night prayermeeting, and have an "evergreen" Sunday-school which has been running 3 or 4 years without intermission. The scholars are getting religion and coming into the church. Most all of them pray in our prayer-meeting.

Brother S., it is encouraging to the few old members that we have lived to see the ranks filling up. It has been our prayer for a long time that our society may continue to the end of time and that many may yet go up from the old (new) church and meet with the old veterans in that upper and bettter world.

Pray for us, brethren out there in the West, and we hope to ever remember you in return. Our prayers ought to mingle in one common interest for the prosperity of Methodism everywhere.

But I must stop. May the Lord bless you and yours in the interests you represent. Excuse this long scribble. I hope you will be able to make the most of it out. It is quite a task for me to write. This may be my last.

Most respectfully,
Payton T. Smith.

LIGHT AND DARKNESS IN CONFUSED RELATIONS TO EACH OTHER.

To us the scripture teaches that at the second coming of our Lord, "the mystery of iniquity will have succeeded in fastening itself upon every interest of life so subtilely as to deceive the very elect if "such a thing were possible." "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear nor dark; but it shall be one day, which shall be known to the Lord, not day, nor night; but it shall come to pass that at evening time it shall be light." Zech. 14: 6-7. The present condition of the civilized world in relation to the great issues that effect directly its business, its social and its religious life, seems to us to be the expression in fact of the above prophetic scene, with other scripture descriptions of the confused conditions of human life at the time of the second coming of our Lord.

Look at the labor and capital question for instance, and see the confusion with regard to their true relation to each other throughout the civilized world. It can be seen that labor is oppressed by capital, and it can be seen also, that capital in the hands of a few, furnish labor for the many, who are less fortunate; but how to legislate for the one, and at the same time so protect the other that great enterprises may be carried on that will develop earth's resources, and bless the world of mankind, are questions about which much fierce confusion have gathered. So that viewed as a whole this vital question is neither "clear nor dark." And then comes "the woman's rights" question that stands out before the civilized world in the same confused, if not antagonizing, admixture of light and darkness as the other. It can be seen that woman has rights as the "helpmeet" for man, that in this sphere she is queen of all that she surveys; but just where this sphere ends and the masculine sphere begins, or whether or not man has a distinctive sphere in life where woman may not enter without her womanly qualities suffering loss, are questions about which public opinion is fast drifting to sea without chart, compass, or rudder. Here, too, the day is neither "clear nor dark." Which to us, is strikingly significant, because darkness entered our world through the effort of woman to enlarge the sphere for the display of her faculties, by passing out of the restraints of law into lawless liberty. Alas! for our day and generation, we have in the "church of the living God," which is the pillar and ground of the truth, "higher criticism" that with much scholastic display, gives to us a Bible that is neither true nor untrue, not "clear nor dark," having errors and truth in its composition, and we are left to the light of reason (?) to reject the one and appropriate the other. What sort of day have we here? Is not this to destroy the foundation, upon which the righteous rests his hope, and from which alone he directs his operations in the spiritual conditions of life successfully? And then in the church life, where it is divinely appointed that we should have the pure, unmisted light of good works from those whom God hath "redeemed from all iniquity, and purified them to unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. We have to an alarming, and fast increasing, extent, worldly amusements and religious exercises. No clear cut line of demonstration here between the world and the church, as it is claimed that the evil is in the abuse, and not in the use of worldly amusements, in their quantity, and not in their quality; and who can tell us just when the point is reached, where innocence ceases and sin begins in their religious(?) use? Here we have a fearful admixture of light and darkness, because it becomes that darkness of which the Savior asks, "How great is that darkness?" And then we have Christ and anti-Christ, Universalism and Salvation by regeneration through faith and obedience alone, all occupying chairs in the same "divinity school." And there is a plan to effect "Christian unity" with a paper devoted to its interests that has the support of distinguished women and divines, of the latter not a few, that will bring into religious fellowship, Baptists, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Methodists, Presbyterians, Unitarians, Universalists and Swedenbergians. "Love your neighbor and respect his beliefs, and accept "Jesus Christ as your leader"—not Savior — are among the leading features of its creed. So some of us who have not been induced into the secrets of that advanced thought that is seeking to "turn the world up side down," and that call everything that moves progress, this is a strange conglomeration of religious elements. Light and darkness commingle here in unsatisfying, not to say deceiving, proportions. And last, but by no means least, our advanced thinkers, or some of them, are preparing to have next September in Chicago, a "congress of all religions," when the representatives of the orthodox faith, or the "faith once delivered for all time and to all "saints," and unorthodox faiths, and idolatrous faiths will meet in religious fellowship, or hold a big "class-meeting," while the world looks on in wonder and astonishment at the attempted fellowships of religious faiths. So utterally antagonistical to each other. Bishop Haygood never uttered a better, nor more timely truth than he did when he said: "It is the humbug of the century." We may next look for that upon which heaven's curse is pronounced? That is calling "evil good, and good evil," putting darkness for light, and light for darkness, and better for sweet, and sweet for bitter." From this advanced modern standpoint it is easy to see that either should have had a class-meeting with Simon Magn, and told his experience, instead of telling him so pointedly that he had no part nor lot in the religion that he taught, and that he perceived that he was in the gall of bitterness, and in the bonds of iniquity, and then exhorting him to repent that God might forgive him. We see that our day is not only "clear nor dark," but we see that the vital interests thereof are attended with a most determined revolutionary spirit, that seeks a change in the relations that they represent by the abolition of law and order, and the establishment of lawless liberty and unmerited equality, which is the issue between the Son of Mary and the old Serpent. And therefore the day can be neither "clear nor dark" until these forces are marshalled upon the world's plan in the interests of lawlessness, and the Son of God appears, which He will do in the "evening time" of the gospel dispensation, and destroys anti-Christ with all of his followers and Satan is chained so that he goes out to deceive the nations no more; then, and not until then, shall "it be light" in our world, which to us seems very near.

Books that Live.

Why do the Bible and Pilgrim's Progress move right on in the midst of the literary pestilence that stalks in darkness and the destruction that wastes at noonday? We may not be able to tell out all the reason, we may hint some things which will help to the solution of the problem. The vital book appeals to fundamental and permanent truth as found in God, man and nature. There are costumes of the time, sure to pass away with the change of fashion; the mere fashion book, however elegant or rich in color and texture, is sure to die. The fashion will change, and the author will appear in the antiquated, high-color coat of his grandfathers, for the sport of a few curious readers who will copy the odd inscription on his tombstone. The Bible reveals the kernel of truth rather than the husk. Forty generations have not outgrown its revelations It marks the highest point in divine truth attained by any explorer.—Zions Herald.

A lofty ideal is essential to the highest living. He who would make progress for himself, or who would help others upward, must have clearly before his mind the ideal of the best conceivable attainment.

OUR PULPIT.

PUNISHMENT FOR SINS.

By Rev. R. Schaeffer.

"What Wilt Thou Say When He Shall Punish Thee," Jer. 13:21. The tendency of the natural mind, said Mrs. Shaffer, is to throw off, or reject, all thought of accountability to God, or responsibility for actions committed. You see this demonstrated in the family, children disposed to have their own way, assuming control of themselves. Few if any parents have passed through such experience. Consequently the wise parent appeals to the child's faculties, his emotions of fear and love, addressing one by argument, by touch, pleading, the other by threatened punishment. So in the state. She promises to her good citizens the privileges of peace and the pursuit of happiness and prosperity, and her strong arm of protection in every hour of need; while her statutes bristle with threatenings, and her jails and penitentiaries are standing monuments of her authority to the lawless and disobedient. Passing from these to the region of the moral and spiritual I remark that God, as the tender and loving father and majestic governor of his creatures, has exhausted the resources of a divine mind in his appeals, and his word abounds in the sweetest and largest promises upon the one hand, and upon the other of awful threatening to the disobedient and finally impeniten. My text refers to the future and is suggestive of grave significance, to which we would do well to give heed. People receive their punishment sometimes in this world. Nations always. The people before the flood ignoring prophets and preachers and angels of God's mercy as they strove and warned, were overwhelmed and destroyed. Egypt, revelling in iniquity and disdaining authority, treasured up wrath against the day of wrath, until the black cloud gathered, out of whose depths the jagged lightning leaped, descending upon her helpless head, inflicting the punishment due for her sins. Rome, in her pride, conquered, dismembered and overthrown, becoming from mistress to servant, from head to tail; Sodom, Tyre, Ninevah, Babylon, all evidence the fact that sin, disobedience to moral requirement must and will be punished. Our own, southland, baptized in blood,' burned in fire, drowned in tears, expiating her sins and receiving punishment of necessity.

The groans of her slaves, the wail of separated wives and husbands, of parents and children, her young men growing up in luxurious idlenesss; brave, chivalrous, and magnanimous but too often proud and overbearing, her sins called for punishment. I speak not now of her superior moral culture, of the kindness of treatment, of the larger part of her slaves nor of the great attachments often existing between owners and owned. These are facts of history known to the intelligent. It is now of her sins, the penalty for which she paid. The fires were necessary to her purification.

But you ask was the south the only sinful and sinning part of our country? Has the north no punishment to endure? The answer to the first is no. The second question, yea, verily. She bought these slaves, and sold them when they became unprofitable. She fattened upon the spoils of the war. Her bondholders and manufacturers and trust companies are revelling on the spoils of a system inaugurated for their benefit and fostered by their influence, and the suffering is now there. A thousand delicate fingers are dripping with blood in making shirts at 50 cents per dozen. The shrunken forms of emaciated women, wornout over the laundry boiler, the droves of girls and boys and women driven back and forth to toil in close factories whose owners are as cruel as the former slave driver and as remorseless as death. Her multiplied thousands of poor crowded to moral and physical suffication, her laborers driven to frenzy through enforced idleness and consequently suffering, her inflated bondholders, manufacturers and multi-millionaries, increasing their gains and adding to their possessions by a system of legalized robbery, are bringing up families in idleness and self indulgence to be their own destroyers. Sin has its own reward. The way of transgression is hard as well as the "way of the transgressor." Nations and cities which sow the dragon's teeth may expect the harvest. The penality is inevitable, as inevitable as the moral ruin that must come to our city, with her 130 saloons, gambling houses and houses of shame, open day and night, in oculating the very fountains of muninicipal and social life, unless a speedy and radical reformaton is consummated. The history of nations all prove the folly of ignoring the threatenings of a merciful but just creator.

But the punishment about which you and I are peculiarly interested is that of a personal and future one. Many are inclined to despise the doctrine of future punishment. A maudlin sentiment seems to have possessed them, and the modern theologian, so called, has sought to explain away the plain teachings of God's word. But if there is one doctrine more plainly taught than another in the Bible, it is that men are to be punished for sins unrepented of. The idea of material fire constituting the punishment of sin, of course, is not believed or preached by intelligent ministers of the gospel. It is impossble that it should be so. Material fire cannot burn an immaterial spirit. It is simply used as the most appropriate figure to represent the torture of an outraged conscience and separation of the immortal spirit from its creator and savior. But that is suffering, which could only be faintly represented by the excruciating pain that fire gives to the flesh.

The cry of dives for a drop of water signified an intolerable spiritual thirst that must now be forever unquenched—a cry for the cessation of remorse. We read of fire that is never quenched, of punishment of everlasting destruction from the presence of God. The word is full of plainest teaching, and there must be a judgment and unpardoned sin punished.

The question of my text then is, What will you say when judgment is pronounced? When crime is charged and proven upon a culprit and sentence about to be pronounced, you will hear, in each instance, the judge ask, "Have you anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced?" Sometimes the answer is, "There were extenuating circumstances." Another, "Before God, I am not guilty." And in many instances the innocent have been adjudged guilty and punished unjustly. But what will you say? You cannot plead guiltless. Conscience, conscience, that you have stifled, conscience, that you have seared as with a hot iron, will then confront you and like a thousand voices within will forbid that plea and say it is just.

"Oh, conscience! into what abyss of fears,
And horrors hast thou driven me,
Out of which I find no way,
From deep to deeper plunged?"

You cannot say your punishment is in excess of crime. You do not now realize the enormity of rejecting Christ and of trampling His precious blood under foot, but you will then. It is an awful thing to despise the atoning blood, and to know that he was slain by your sins.

Shakespeare, the immortal, makes Lady Macbeth say, "Out damned spot! Out, I say * * * Here is the smell of blood still; all the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand, oh, oh, oh!" And this because of Banquo's murder. Remorse had dethroned her reason. The blood of the murdered man cried from the ground and from her hand. "Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, an unholy thing." That blood will condemn, and pronounce the sentence just.

Will you hope for pardon, executive clemency? The law is rigid—there is no favoritism. In many instances, men are pardoned after suffering for a period, by the interposition of friends. All are released after three-fourths time. But God cannot interfere. Both justice and mercy forbid it. Life and death are set before you. It was your choice to disobey. It must be your lot to suffer.

The idea of a second probation, which the "new theologians" advocate, and of future reformation is a figment of the brain, and without our support in all God's word. There is no repentance in the grave. "He that is unjust let him be unjust, still. He that is filthy, let him be filthy still." The die is cast. If you would escape present and future suffering submit yourself to the requirements of God's word, obey His will while time is going; now while God invites; while Jesus, the friend of sinners, offers life and eternal blessedness.

"Bow to the sceptre of His word,
Renouncing every sin;
Submit to Him your Savior, Lord,
And learn his will divine."

I AM IN NEED.

Come along and help me out. I am stationed away out here in this far away sunset land, California, the golden west, in the pretty little seaside town of San Buena Ventura, right at the water's edge of the restless old Pacific, where "people are not more religious than they ought to be." I serve a faithful band of Methodists who, at much sacrifice have erected a splendid church building, and now the watchword is, a parsonage. We need it so much. Rents are so high! Now I'll tell you. Let every one who reads this send 50 cents for a 5x8 photo of our pretty seaside church (pastor and wife thrown in) and thus help us out in our parsonage enterprise. Address at once Rev. Sam M. Chase, or Dr. S. L. Stuart, San Buena Ventura, California.

Whittier was color-blind, and on one occasion purchased a bright red nectie, supposing it to be a dull green one. He wore it several times, and was not aware of his mistake until one of his Quaker brethren remarked: "Thee's never worn a necktie like that before, Greenleaf; does thee think it is becoming?"

Put the right kind of a man in any community and he will soon make every mean man among his neighbors feel ashamed of himself.

KEEPING THE SABBATH.

Neh. XIII. 15-22.

GOLDEN TEXT:—Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.—Exodus xx: 8.

ILLUSTRATIVE APPLICATIONS.

BY H. CLAY TRUMBULL.

TREADING THE WINEPRESSES ON THE SABBATH, AND BRINGING IN SHEAVES, AND LADING ASSES (v. 15). It is very easy to break the Sabbath in harvest-time. The bigger the crop the more need there seems to be of taking every day in the week for its ingathering. And if the weather is a little better for harvesting on the Sabbath than it has been during the week, there is fine chance of talk of "a work of necessity." How hard it is for men to believe that more can be done to advantage in six days, with God's blessing, than in seven days without it! What faith it requires to trust God to take care of his children on the one day of the week in which he would have them give up all work for their own benefit! Yet there is no really good farming which leaves out of account the Lord of the harvest—in haying time.

AS ALSO WINE, GRAPES, AND FIGS, AND ALL MANNER OF BURDENS. If the Sabbath is broken on one plea, it becomes easier to break it on another. If it is right to bring in the hay because it may get wet, why shouldn't the milk be sent to godly city purchasers lest it grow sour? And if there is no harm in having milk served from house to house on the Sabbath, why shouldn't fresh bread from the baker's, and fresh fruit from the market, be regularly supplied? And so with ice-cream from the confectioner's; "and all manner of burdens," especially if that is the one day of the week when all the family are together and a good breakfast and dinner are so enjoyable. How easy it is to go on from step to step in Sabbath-breaking, until the brief hours in church service are about all that mark the difference between that day and the others! For you know, "the Sabbath was made for man," and doesn't that show that man should take as much as possible for himself, and give as little as possible to the Lord?

MEN OF TYRE ALSO.....BROUGHT IN FISH, AND ALL MANNER OF WARE, AND SOLD ON THE SABBATH UNTO THE CHILDREN OF JUDAH (v. 16). It is useless to expect a higher standard of morals outside of the church than inside. If members of the church will buy newspapers on the Sabbath, the world's people will print them. If Christians will take a train on that day every time it is convenient to them, railroad men who are not Christians will see to it that the trains are kept running. It is for the Lord's people to say what shall be the popular standard in morals in their neighborhood. Men of Tyre are sure to be found peddling "all manner of ware" on the Sabbath, so long as "the children of Judah" are ready to buy from them. A good way to promote godly living among those outside of the church is by raising the standard of living among church-members.

WHAT EVIL THING IS THIS THAT YE DO? (v. 17.) A great deal of wrong-doing in the world is from sheer thoughtlessness. "I didn't think," is the child's excuse for many a little misdemeanor. "I didn't think," might be the explanation by many a grown up sinner of his greater and sadder misdeeds. To think is a duty. Young and old ought to think of the right or wrong of their words and acts—of the consequences also. If only they WOULD think of the evil and the possible results of their unkind words, of their revengeful feelings, of their first step in a dishonest or impure course, of their dishonoring God's name and house and day, and of their many other misdoings, how surely they would shrink from pushing forward in that direction. That is a good question to press home to every sinner concerning his way of transgression. "What evil thing is this that ye do?"

DID NOT YOUR FATHERS THUS? (v. 18.) It is not from lack of warning examples that men decide to go wrong, when they stop and think of the probable consequences of their course. All manner of evil was done, and punished, in former generations, and the record of it is preserved, but that does not make this generation godly. The very follies and vices to which you are now tempted are those which brought trouble to your ancestors; and you know it. It was just such tobacco as you use which rendered your father's person so offensive, and so beclouded his brain. The best liquor which you can buy is no purer than that which made your grandfather or your uncle a drunkard. It was just such a disregard of economy and prudence as yours which wasted that property which might have been inherited by you. A knowledge of the evils of Sabbath-breaking and wine-drinking and beer-drinking in continental Europe does not forbid the advocacy of free drinking and no Sabbath by the sons of Europeans in America. The history for centuries of fruitless speculations, with their train of attendant misery, did not cause men to be fairly cautious in our day. The known hardness of the way of transgressors by no means restrains the wilful and the foolish from entering therein. Yes, your fathers did thus. You have no doubt on that point. And they were the losers by it. Why should you expect to fare better than they?

I COMMANDED THAT THE DOORS SHOULD BE SHUT: . . . AND SOME OF MY SERVANTS SET I OVER THE GATES (v.19). If you expect to bring about a reform in the morals of the community, you must do something more than express an opinion on the subject. It is not enough to whine over the low standard existing, and to say that people ought to be ashamed of themselves to act as they do. Vigorous effort is called for; and co-workers—servants or helpers of some sort—must be enlisted for duty. Reforms don't work themselves in this world. They require planning and pushing. If you want to lessen Sabbath-breaking, liquor drinking and selling, the circulation of obscene publications, the enticements of low theatres and vile houses, and all the other forms of popular evil, you must be up and doing, must see that the doors of vice are shut, and that somebody is set to watch the gates. It is of little use for you to know that these wrong things are very common, and to say that they are altogether too bad. You must do something to put a stop to them, or must help those who are doing.

THE . . . SELLERS OF ALL KIND OF WARE LODGED WITHOUT JERUSALEM ONCE OR TWICE (v:20). Success in the struggle against evil depends quite as much on perseverance as on energy. The Devil and his agents are patient and persistent. They are willing to wait, if need be, for the zeal of their opposers to grow cool. "Keep still," they say in revival times; "these meetings won't last always, and then Christians will slacken their efforts to win souls." "This temperance crusade is only a flurry. When it is over, we can sell as much liquor as ever." "We must close our shops for a few Sundays. After election, the police will let us alone again." Enemies of the Lord's cause and of the Lord's people, once driven from their strongholds, will watch anxiously for a chance of regaining their lost ground. Habits of evil, pet sins, and special temptations, shut out from the heart, will lodge without at least "once or twice," ready to get back again at the first sign of carelessness inside.

REMEMBER UNTO ME, O MY GOD, THIS ALSO, AND SPARE ME ACCORDING TO THE GREATNESS OF THY MERCY (v:22). Well doing is commendable in God's sight. When we have done well we can properly speak of it in our prayers; for it is a fitting cause of satisfaction and gratitude. But we musn't base any claim of reward on it. God owes us nothing for our best service. All that we have any right to ask of God is mercy,—even when our record of work is fairest. "Even so ye also, when ye shall have done all the things that are commanded you, [you ought to] say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done [no more than] that which it was our duty to do." Have you recently been doing good service in promoting the cause of good morals, in sustaining the laws, in ministering to the needy? Have you been peculiarly faithful in Sunday-school teaching, in prayer-meeting exercises, in winning souls to Christ by personal effort and prayer? Then may God spare you according to His greatness and mercy. You have not always done so well. You are one of God's unprofitable servants. May he forgive your shortcomings for the sake of Him who died for just such sinners as you are.—S. S. Times.

In Syria there were fifty men who were anxious to hear the gospel, but as there was no money to employ a preacher for their village they became discouraged and drifted away. In India fifty Christian students were dismissed from college because there was not money enough to pay for their tuition, and all the money that was needed was $140. In Laos there is no obstacle to the advance in mission work except lack of funds. In one province, where a short visit was made by two missionaries, the wife of the governor, begged that they would give her one month's instruction, so that she might learn to read, but they had not time to wait, so that opportunity was lost.

Next to the Moravians comes the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, in the army of missionary workers. They have 570 churches and 185,000 members and last year they contributed $400,000 to the cause of missions, and gained 600 converts.

In 1849 there were only 12 medical missionaries in all the non-Christian world. Now there are 400 and every year sees an addition to the number.

J. H. Taylor, founder of the Chinese Island Mission, says that if success be really desired, there must be Christly giving and Christly service. Not that which is done for Christ's sake merely, but that which is done after Christ's pattern.

Another missionary ship is asked for from the children, by the American Board, for work in the Pacific Ocean. It is to be called Hiram Bingham, and $5,000 is needed for the work.

The widows of India number four times as many as the entire population of London.

A Christian Endeavor Society among the Sioux Indians has established a Sunday school for the benefit of the poor white children on the reservation, and they have given fifty dollars to help plant Sunday schools among the white children of South Dakota.

Dr. John G. Paton has been able to give $25,000 to his work in the New Hebrides, from the profits of his autobiography.

The greatest objection that the planters had to the missionaries coming to the West Indies was that they could make the natives better Christians than their Masters.

SIN.

It is a very little word, repuiring but three small letters to spell it, and the slightest exercise of the vocal organs, without even the movement of the lips, to pronounce it. And a still less effort possibly to commit it. Yet there is nothing in the wide world as far reaching in its influence in bringing misery and destruction to humanity. Sin is declared to be "the transgression of the law" and one of the catechisms adds "want no conformity to it." Law, in its highest sense is the truth and the right asserting itself in life. Sin is the opposite of this. It antagonizes truth and righteousness. It is contrary to life. It makes war on law and order and seeks to throttle that which is the condition true of life. It is the wildest and wickedest anarchy. It incites to rebellion, and worketh death , whether in civil, social, or individual life. If unchecked and permitted to go its full length, it would overturn the throne of the Highest, and cause chaos and darkness to reign supreme, and then laugh with the hellish glee at the destruction wrought. It is the spirit that rules in the children of disobedience, producing wrath, enmity, contentions, murders, striefs, revelings, adulteries, defamations, and such like. Never a tear shed, not a heartache, not a wail of sorrow in all this world of woe that has not been caused by this monster sin.

But it is hard for the human mind, so engrossed with base and sordid things, so bent on getting gain and making a show, so blinded by the god of this world, to understand the true idea of law and hence of sin in the spiritual conditions of life. They are disposed to think that because they are not thieves, robbers, murderers or adulterers in the ordinary sense of these words as "other men" are "even the poor publicans" about them that the Lord owes them a debt of lasting gratitude when in fact they are too often like the whited sepulchers beautiful without but full of all uncleanness within. The human heart under the dominion of sin is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. When the Savior came to "condemn sin in the flesh," he unmasked the monster and chased it to its citadel in the soul and placed upon it a brand that all the world may readily recognize. He taught that "not what goeth into a man defileth him, but that which cometh out," and "he that looketh upon a woman to lust after her hath already committed adultery with her in his heart." "Out of the heart proceedeth evil thoughts, adulteries, murders, revelings and such like." He taught that sin is the will of man resisting and antagonizing the will of God.

To the men who brought the adulterous woman to our Lord for his condemnation he said: "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone at her." They were convicted and confounded. So it is with those to-day who boast of their own righteousness; when brought face to face with His word and compare with their own deceitful hearts and crooked lives they are found wanting. The book declares that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." "There is none righteous, no not one." "If a man say that he hath not sinned (and needs not the cleansing blood of Christ,) he is a liar, and the truth is not in him."

Sin is an act, a wicked and rebellious act, entailing guilt which calls for condemnation and punishment. Not only so, but it is also represented as a master, an evil bias or power, or principle that has gotten the mastery of its subject hand holds him fast in slavish chains. Paul speaks of men being "under the dominion of sin," "the servant of sin." There is a "law in his members" that "when he would do good, evil is present with him," and to the awakened sinner this becomes a source of great distress, causing him to cry out, "Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death?"

Sin is also represented as a moral disease, a plague, a leprosy, diffusing itself throughout the entire nature, corrupting and poisoning the very fountains of its life and threatening it with an awful death. The character and also the effect of sin is the same, to the covetous man, to the man of impure thoughts or unholy aspirations, who lives in a palace surrounded by culture and luxury, as well as to the drunkard or debauche in the darkest den of infamy. In high life or in low, "the soul that sinneth, it shall die." It is only a question of time when "he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption."

O, for revivals that will increase our hatred for sin, and prompt to more stenuous efforts to save those who are being deceived and destroyed by it.

THE DISTRICT CONFERENCE.

The time for the annual round of district conferences is at hand. This is a comparatively new institution in Methodism, but like most others, it is a good one, and has come to stay. This body is composed of all the preachers, traveling and local, in a presiding elder's district, and laymen, the number of whom and manner of appointment, is determined by each annual conference. In Montana, two lay delegates are elected by the quarterly conference of each pastoral charge. The presiding elder presides, unless there is a bishop present. It meets once a year. It is different from the annual or quarterly conference, in that there is less business of a stereotyped and strictly official character to be transacted. There are no changes of preachers, and no elections of stewards or other official boards, no church trials, and really no business that is calculated to cause any particular care or solicitude except the election, by the laymen alone, of four of their number as delegates to the ensuing annual conference. True, the records of the quarterly conferences are examined and passed upon, and reports are made from the various charges, but the latter are not of the same character as as those made at the other conferences.

The principal object of the district conference is to inquire into the spiritual state of the church and to promote greater spiritual activity and to study the best methods of doing this work. It gives a fine opportunity from the development of the lay element in the church, which is expected to be well represented, and helps to bring the preachers and laymen to a better acquaintance and chosen sympathy with each other in the work.

The different lines of church work are discussed. Sunday Schools, prayermeetings, finances, circulation of church papers, and the prospects for new missions considered. Both preachers and laymen get new ideas by comparison of methods and results of work in various charges. Common experiences, common trials and triumphs draw them closer together and their love for each other and for the work becomes stronger.

"Prominence is given to religious exercises." As there is absence of the solicitude often felt at the quarterly or annual gatherings there is better opportunity for concentration of thought and effort for a deeper and richer Christian experience and for the awakening and conversion of sinners, and the building up and strengthening the church of God. We have known district conferences that resulted in glorious revivals of religion where the cause of God was permanently established, and strengthened.

There is no reason why our approaching district conference should not surpass an ordinary annual conference in the impression it will make upon the spiritual life of the community. True, there will be no bishop and no connectional officers there. But if we can prevail upon the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls to be there, it will more than answer every purpose. The body will be much larger in numbers if there is anything like a full attendance, than the annual conference, for the latter body can have but four lay delegates in it (as we have but one district in Montana), and the district conference will have all the annual conference members, besides three or four times as many lay members. The coming together of fifteen or twenty preachers (traveling and local) with as many laymen (and women—God bless them), fresh from fields of conflict and of victory; if they come in the true spirit, "in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ," ougth to bring and leave a blessing to any place where they assemble. Much depends upon the preparation made, spiritually, for the occasion. Let every member take advantage at once of the thought suggested in Brother Bramble's topic in the printed program and improve the time between now and the 27th of March, prayerfully studying and persistently practising, "How to get ready for a district conference." If so, we will have the very best meeting of the kind ever yet held in Montana.

THE BEAUTY OF HOLINESS.

By Sadie Brallier Noffsinger.

This is, in itself, a beautiful subject. There are few others more grand and fitting,and scarcely another so deep and high and broad and significant; because it reaches from the heart of man even to the heart of God.

Holiness is beautiful in all its attributes. From the repentant cry of a sin-sick soul, to the triumphant music of a song of praise; from the weak struggle of a tempted heart, to the abounding strength of the conqueror; from the aspirations of impetuous youth, to the ripe perfection of the grey-haired pilgrim, in all alike there is ineffable loveliness portrayed; because each one is invigorated by the redeeming breath of holiness.

If there is one inspiration, above all others which makes us better men and women, that inspiration is to holiness. If there is one virtue above all others which purifies our thoughts and deeds, that virtue is holiness. If there is one grace above all others which adorns and beautifies the heart, that grace is holiness. If there is one blessing above all others which comforts and cheers the soul, that blessing is holiness. We may aspire unto much; we may undertake much; we may yearn for much; we may suffer much. But if holiness lives within the breast, we are sure to win the victory. Give testimony, ye who have overcome the world, and are sanctified by the omnipotent power of holiness.

There is an idea afloat that holiness can be obtained only when we pass within the gates of the New Jerusalem. This idea is somehow, prevalent,and should be effectually obliterated from the hearts of men. Our earthly probation was given us for the purpose of learning the lesson of holiness; and it is meet that we unravel the profound mystery with all its perplexities in order that we become worthy to inhabit that far away kingdom "wherein dwelleth righteousness;" for nothing defied, unholy or impure can have its abode within that blissful state. Since this is eternal truth we must acknowledge that holiness is the pass-word that shall admit us into that blood-washed audience around "the great white throne." Oh! let us be glad that there are men and women among God's chosen who know the joy and blessedness of a truly consecrated life who have risen above the slum and mire of earth and sit with Him in "heavenly places." Thrice blessed are they, for they have learned the mystery of holiness and obtained the peace of the redeemed and santcified by works through faith! Let us pray that the time may come when unbelief shall be utterly abolished from our land — when every "knee shall bow and every tongue confess" that all things are possible to us through Christ, even to holiness and sanctification in the flesh!

Holiness is a virtue which must be experienced, rather than painted or expressed. In vain have sculptors tried to mold that beauty; in vain have poets tried to tell its worth. It's only model is God himself who abides alone in the the hearts of his chosen ones.

We look into the home where holiness abides, and our hearts have all the beauty that is conspicuous there. If there is a type of Heaven to be found upon this earth surely it is the Christian home where the family altar is established and the united energies of the family circle dedicated to the Master's cause. Let it be remembered that the home influence will govern the after life of son and daughter, be it good or evil; and they will be to the world and church largely what their early training made them. "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old he will not depart from it."

In instituting the church, the Divine idea was, that therein holiness should reign supreme, "That He might present it unto himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." Lest we, as a church, degenerate from this sublime idea it behooves us that we cleanse ourselves from all babbling and slandering; all vanity and hypocrisy; all profanity and intemperance;all licentiousness and lust, and present ourselves "A living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God." This is the mystery of holiness! A hard lesson it surely is; but we have no hope of eternal life unless we learn it thoroughly and live it out in its deepest, highest and broadest meaning. For "He that is unjust let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy let him be filthy still; and he that is holy let him be holy still; and he that is righteous let him be righteous still. And behold I come quickly and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Oh, brother! sister! we must grow into holiness this side of Heaven.

It is a thought worthy of consideration that holiness cannot be obtained in a moment's space. To reach that perfect standard means active, efficient work; and days and nights and months and years perhaps must be sacrificed ere the summit can be gained. The beauty of that holy plane is so majestic, so enrapturing,so divine that mortal eyes could not bear the dazzling brightness all at once; and thus it is that we must first view it from a far,and behold the crowning radiance only when we are "also perfect."

Walnut Grove, Pa.

Quietness Before God.

Quietness before God, especially in hours of trial, is one of the most rare and difficult of graces. Yet when it is gained, it proves one of the most wholesome in its influence. None pleases God more;none renders religion more beautiful in the eyes of men. We shudder at the sight of that surgical knife which God employs upon us. Our self-love rebels against the excruciating "operation," but when God—who wounds in order to heal—is engaged in his providential process of amputating a darling lust, or cutting out an ulcer of besetting sin, our "strength is to sit still." "Keep still, my friend; be quiet," says the army surgeon to the writhing soldier under his keen knife. "Restlessness only endangers a false cut of the knife, and only aggravates the wound." So, when God is operating on the heart by sharp trials, the first duty of his child is perfect, submissive, unquestionable quietness. A score of Christians can pray and give and work for God, where one can be found ready to sit down and suffer. To go into battle with the bugles sounding, and the very blood leaping to the fingers' ends under the impetuous charge, is full of thrilling exhilaration; but to be picked up bloody and mangled, and borne back among pitying comrades to the rear; to be laid down helpless in the hospital and await your slow turn for the surgeon's probe; to be transferred from his knife (with one limb the less) into the nurse's silent "ward" of sufferers—to do and bear all this calls out the loftiest qualities of heroism. The battle-field costs less than the hospital. So in the spiritual conflict God puts especial honor on the grace of passive submission. He commends the "strength to sit still;" he approves that patient quietness which "behaves itself like a child which is weaned of its mother." And the loftiest saints in the Bible are those who have become the most "perfect through suffering."

Quietness under God's discipline is simply the willingness to let God have his own way. It is ready to go where he sends us, to bear what he lays upon us, to sit still just where he places us. Why should we desire to get away from his blessed discipline? When you would fill a vessel with water from a hydrant or a rain-spout, you do not remove the vessel while the stream is pouring in. It is filled by sitting still. And if God's storms are filling your heart with heaven-descended graces, why should you seek to move away from beneath its blessed outpour? If God is refining your heart, why seek to be taken out of the furnace? We have seldom met with a finer illustration of this grace of quietness than was presented by an aged lady, who, after a busy life of doing good, was at length laid upon her bed pain-worn and helpless. A good minister went to see her, and asked if after her active habits, she did not find her confinement hard to bear? "No, sir," said she, "not at all. When I was well, I used to hear the Lord say day by day, 'Betty, go here; Betty, go there; Betty, do this and do that,' and I used to do it as well as I could; but now I hear him say, 'Betty, lie still and cough.'" Which of these two acts of obedience was the most difficult to perform we leave our readers to testify from their own experience.—The Evangelist.

Church News.

Along the west coast of Africa there are now 200 churches, 35,000 converts, 100,000 adherents, 275 schools and 30,000 pupils. Some knowledge of the Gospel has reached about eight millions of benighted Africans.—Chicago Interior.

The good work of the American Bible Society continues. At the seventy-sixth annual meeting, held at the Bible House, May 11th, the report showed that during the year 1,293,631 copies of the Scriptures had been circulated by the society's agents. Of these copies, 434,240 went into foreign lands. The receipts during the fiscal year closing March 31, showed a total of $556,527.29; the disbursements exceeded this sum by about $7,000.

The issues of the two great Bible societies of the world—one in England and the other in America—up to April 1st, last, were 183,387,489 copies, and of the lesser societies 64,614,511 copies; in all, 240,000,000 copies since the year 1804, the year of the organization of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

The total issues of the Bible societies of the world for the last year amounted to more than 7,000,000, or more than enough to distribute a fresh copy to each inhabitant in the Empire State. The average existence of the two great Bible societies is eighty-two years, and during this time the receipts have amounted to more than $82,000,000. The average cost of the publications of the two great Bible societies is about forty-four and three-quarter cents.

There are 200 baptized Christians in Uganda, in connection with the Missionary Society, and about 2,000 adherents under instruction. The Gospel of Matthew has been translated into the native tongue. The arrival of 100 copies from England was attended with the wildest joy.

ESTHER BEFORE THE KING.

Esther iv. 10 17. v. 1-3.

THE LESSON STORY.

BY CUNNINGHAM GEIKIE, D. D., LL. D.

The story of Esther takes us back fifty years from the time of Nehemiah, who returned from the court of Susa, or Shusan, about the year 433, to Jerusalem, while the great feast in the palace Xerxes, with which the Book of Esther opens, was held in the year 483 before Christ. In 486 Darius had died; and his son Xerxes, the King Ahasuerus of the Book of Esther, now reigned in his stead.

The Persian monarchs of the line of Darius had four residences, in different parts of their dominions, to suit the climate of the seasons. They spent the spring at Babylon; the summer at Ectabana, among the cool mountains of Media; the autumn at Persepolis; and the winter at Susa, the Shusan of Esther. This city was about a hundred and fifty miles north of the head of the Persian Gulf, in the mountainous province of Susiana, east of the Tigris. Shining rivers, among which was the Eulaeus, or Ulai of Daniel, beautified the valley in which it lay, shut in by a rampart of lofty mountains. A city had long stood in this site, but it had been sacked by Sardanapalus of Assyria about the year 650 B. C. From the statement of the plunder carried off, as given in the annals of the conqueror, it must have been a splendid and very wealthy place.

It remained obscure and ruined till Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, a century after the Assyrian catastrophe, determined to restore its grandeur. The Persians having no architecture of their own, Cambyses sent a great body of workmen from Egypt, so famous for its palaces and temples, to build a mighty palace for him in this old royal city; but his death, soon after, left it to Darius to carry out the design. The vast mass of structures included in the palace were, therefore, in their brilliant newness, if, indeed, entirely finished throughout, when Xerxes ascended the throne, in B. C. 486.

The campaigns of Persia in Egypt and Asia Minor, countries linked with each other by various close alliances, had led Cyrus, and after him Darius, to attempt the complete conquest of the Greek states on both sides of the Ægean Sea. This scheme, which threatened to overwhelm the western world in a flood of Asiatic barbarism and despotism, was defeated four years before the death of Darius, by the victory of Miltiades and the Athenians at Marathon, over invading hosts of Orientals. This turning-point in the history of the world marked the year 490. Xerxes was determined to make another effort. So great an enterprise, however, required long preparations, and, to insure that these should be vigorous, it was imperative that the great officers of the hundred and twenty-seven provinces, stretching from India to Ethiopia, embraced in the mighty empire of Persia, should be summoned to the presence of the great king. The number of troops to be raised in each satrapy, their equipment and maintenance, the appointment of commanding officers, the lines of march, the date of starting and of rendezvous at some common center, and countless other essential matters, needed to be discussed and settled, not to speak of the decision on the details of the plan of campaign. The meeting of such a galaxy of the magnates of the empire, moreover, would kindle that enthusiasm which was the vital breath of such a stupendous undertaking.

Accordingly, in B. C. 483, the third year of the reign of Xerxes, all the satraps, with their gorgeous retinues and high officials, gathered by royal summons at Susa, attended by an imposing display of the forces of Media and Persia. The deliberations lasted for six months, doubtless with great pomp of feasting and luxurious entertainment. At length they ended, their close being celebrated by a grand banquet to all who had been entertained in this immence circuit of the palace, in which, we are told, fifteen thousand men sat down each day at table, at a cost of ninety thousand pounds, or four hundred and fifty thousand dollars daily.

The great dining--hall in which the banquet was held (seven days being needed to feast the vast numbers invited) has recently been excavated, and is found to have enclosed a space of an acre and a half, with a double portico on three of its sides. Its flat roof was supported by fluted columns, over eighteen feet in diameter, elaborately decorated, and surmounted by a cornice of two great bull's heads. From the lofty tops of this forest of marble or porphyry columns, the double-headed bull's gleamed down, with horns, feet, eyes, and necks covered with thin plates of gold. Under a net work of cedar rafters, resting on cedar cornices, the feast was spread. The great walls glittered with enameled bricks, covered with the most exquisite ornamental work. A cornice of enameled tiles of turquois-blue rose above, and, screens of the finest wood-carving, with hangings of the three royal colors, white, green, and purple-blue, veiled the many entrances, and were looped by cords of fine linen and purple to silver cylinders or marble pillars. The dining couches were of silver and gold, the pavement of alabaster, white and black marble, and mother-of-pearl, over which were spread countless carpets of the finest looms of Babylonia and Sardis. Everything else was in keeping. The very wine-goblets were of gold, and the finest vintages flowed like water. High above all the carousers sat Xerxes, on a golden throne, under a crimson canopy embrodiered with gold and resting on golden supports.

But the rejoicings were destined to have a touch of the tragic before they closed. On the seventh day, when Xerxes had inflamed himself with wine, he so far forgot his dignity and the rules of the state propriety as to order the seven court eunuchs to bring in his chief queen Vashti, that he might let the company see her charms. But Her Majesty had more respect to the king's honor and her own than to expose herself thus before a mob of half-drunken nobles, contrary to the rules of Eastern modesty, and would not obey. It was enough. She had enemies, of course, among the courtiers; and hence "the wise men," when consulted, advised the infuriated king to dismiss her, which he accordingly did.

Shortly after, he set out for Greece, and returned to Susa only at the end of four years. Vashti was gone. Who should take her place? Finally a young Jewess was chosen by Xerxes, in ignorance of her nationality. She was the cousin of a Jew who held some post in the huge palace population. This relative, Mordecai by name, was fortunate enough to discover a plot laid against the king's life, which was duly revealed to Xerxes by the new queen,—Esther. The disclosure proved, at a later time, of the highest importance to the interests of Mordecai.

The East is the very seed-plot of such crooked intrigues; and another plot was contrived by the highest of the dignitaries of the court,—Haman, apparently a last surviver of the chiefs of the Amalekites, and hence a hereditary enemy of the Jew. Finding that he was slighted by Mordecai, who was evidently a Jew, he vowed vengeance against all the race, so far as they were to be found in the wide bounds of the empire. But this again was discovered by Mordecai, who soon found means to tell the bad news to Esther. She, perhaps, might keep the king from permitting the crime to be carried out. It was dangerous to approach him when not summoned to do so; but she would perish if the plot succeeded, while, if she succeeded, she would save, not only her own life, but the lives of her people over the whole empire. Strong-minded, and loyal to her cousin and her people, she resolved to risk all in the attempt to save their lives and her own.

At her request a fast of three days was kept by all the Jews in Susa, while Esther herself and her maidens fasted inside the palace. The three sad days once over, the queen prepared for her perilous task. Putting on her royal apparel, she boldly went into the inner court of the palace, from which she could be seen by the king, who, at the moment she had chosen, was sitting on his throne. It was a daring act; for the fears of despotism had made it a law that any one who entered the inner court unsummoned should be put to death, unless the king should hold out his golden scepter, as a sign that their life was to be spared. Would Xerxes hold it out now? Her anxiety was soon relieved; for, when he saw the queen standing in the court, he was moved kindly towards her, and held out the symbol of forgiveness and favor. She approached the earthly lord of life and death, and, as was required, touched the top of the scepter. Xerxes welcomed her with effusion? What did she wish? Only let her tell him, and she should have it, even "to the half of his kingdom."

The result is known. Measures were taken which not only prevented a massacre of the Jews, but enabed them to inflict heavy revenge on their enemies,—a spirit in which, unfortunatey, we find even Esther indulging to a painful extent. Meanwhile Haman fell under the displeasure of his master and, with all his sons, was hung up on a great pole, on which he had intended to have hung Mordecai.—S. S. Times.

A missionary in Madagascar writes as to the source of progress which has been witnessed in that great island within the past few years, that it was the Bible that made Madagascar. They have now in Madagascar 1,360 congregations—self-supporting congregations—and that work has been mainly done by the Bible. The people of Madagascar have only one book, and that book the Bible, and they regard all other books as only useful so far as they throw light on the Bible, and help them to understand it. The Roman Catholics had been in Madagascar since 1616, but no trace of their work remains because they did not give the Word of God to the people.

KLAMATH FALLS, OREGON.

J. F. Wallace, P. C.:—Enclosed find one dollar to pay for your excellent paper. Last Saturday and Sunday we held our second quarterly conference. Our presiding elder, Rev. H. S. Shangle, could not be with us on account of the snow in the mountains, which is from three to five feet deep. We have about twelve inches of snow here in the basin at present. We have had but one revival in our work this year, which was held at Haynesville, resulting in three accessions and the church greatly revived.

—o—

Love much and well if you would enjoy living.

FROM REV. L. B. STATELER.

ABOUT THE MISSIONARY DEBT.

Dear Brother Stanley:—Enclosed find $25.00 to pay my subscription to the missionary debt. Please forward it at once to the treasurer, for I am exceedingly anxious for the liquidation of the debt. I sincerely hope all our preachers and laymen will send at once the amounts they pledged at conference. I have helped two or three times to pay the debt. I trust I shall hear from it no more.

I am now with Brother and Sister Tabor at Bozeman. The presiding elder is here. The association with these friends is very refreshing to me.

—o—

SOUTH BOULDER.

T. T. Black:—I like the little paper, and feel that it does me good to read it. We are glad that you are able to improve the paper, and will try and get you some subscribers. Brother Squires has been here, and everybody is in love with him. The work here is not in a very flourishing condition, but what there is left of us are holding fast and hoping for the best. The M. E. church has no service here at present, and some of their people welcome our minister heartily. The so-called Christian church has service here once a month.

—o—

WILLOW CREEK.

W. T. Goulder:—We dedicated our new parsonage last Sunday, (5th) by preaching in it. The day was bitter cold, and only a few had the courage to come out. We could not get the church warm, so they all came over to the parsonage and I preached to them the best I could from James 4:7. We trust that good will come of it. Our work is doing as well as could be expected under the circumstances. Cannot hope to do much until spring.

—o—

LELAND, IDAHO.

W. S. Hornbuckle:—I thought I would write you a private letter as I could not see anything in the "Methodist," and spite you by sending you four new subscribers and the money to renew my own. (Here follows the names). There. How does that strike you? More to follow.

If our Idaho itinerant, who never forgets the "Methodist" could see the broad smile that played over our editorial physiognomy as we received that five dollar money order and read over those names, and that still lingers as we write these lines, he would not need to ask how such things strike us. We are rather in favor of such spite work, and could endure a good deal of that kind of pommeling. And "more to follow." Only think of it. We always liked those words, and none the less when used in this connection. They are most pleasing to an editor. Come again, and come often, Brother H.

Brother Squires writes that he will go to Wallace, Idaho, March 4th, thence to Upper Bitter Root—Corvallis, Hamilton and Grantsdale. His family will accompany him to the Valley.

From Brother Squire's "field notes" it will be seen that the District Conference for Helena District will be held at Deer Lodge, commencing the 27th of March. The presiding elder writes that he wants to make it "an occasion" and urges us to "come to stay over Sunday and on ad-infinitum." If the printed program is carried out in full, our brother will surely have his wish. But the length of the session will needs be like the editor's invitation, ad-infinitum and the hospitality of the good people of Deer Lodge will be severely tested. We trust that it may be a time of great refreshing.

—o—

ENCOURAGING WORDS.

Mrs. M. E. Cales writes from Richmond, Va.: I want to renew my subscription. Your paper affords me much pleasure—more since I visited your beautiful valley and met with so many of your good people. May God abundantly bless and prosper the good work in the far West.

Mrs. Sarah J. Goff writes from Stevensville, Montana: "I send you two dollars, one to renew my subscription and one for a new subscriber whose name I send. I hope to see the day when I can add more to your paper. I cannot stop thinking how God adds his blessing to those who trust in him. If we are ashamed to own him, we have no blessing. I hope we can make our paper a light to many homes and the means of leading many into the love of God through Jesus Christ."

Rev. Henry Barnhart writes: Send me some extra copies to Express, Ore. We have 34 new converts there, and I need the "Methodist" there to help me in my pastoral work, which will be delightful.

Geo. W. Hill, Jr., of Jamesport, Mo., renews his subscription and says: Very much pleased with the visits of your excellent paper. Glad to hear the cheering reports from Squires and Tabor. May God bless you.

A lady friend writes from Virginia City, Montana: "Enclosed find two dollars, which is double the amount I usual send to renew my subscription. Is that complying with Brother Bell's proportion?

Now you need not think I am going to thank or congratulate you for publishing the paper every week, for I am not."

All right we can endure a goodly measure of such scolding as the above when accompanied with perquisites of the same character and proportion. We would like to get just fifty letters such as the above in one week. They would help "mightily" in paying our printing bills. Who next will respond to Brother Bell's proposition. Let the good work go forward.

—o—

FIELD NOTES.

Rev. J. E. Squires, P. E.

"Dear Methodist:—I now improve the time, by penning you some other conference notes to let us all know what each other is doing. And first of all I am glad to say that all of our preachers and their families are well, and none of them have suffered greatly, even in the midst of the exceeding cold weather. We have learned that the most pious thing to do in the most severe weather is to stay indoors and care for ourselves and our family.

Bro. Lee has had much sickness in his home and lost his baby boy. Brother Tabor was poorly for some weeks, but is much stronger now, while Bro. Alton, myself and others have had a sort of epizootic, but all of us are able for our meals and our part of duty.

The quarterly conference at Bozeman last Saturday and Sunday was an occasion of unusual interest to us all. Bro. Robt L. Glasgow was to be licensed to preach, and Father Stateler was with us in a good spirit. The meeting began on Friday according to a venerable custom, and by Sunday the tide was high and the congregation good and the communion service very sweet. Bro. Tabor's S. S. was full, had averaged 59, for the quarter with 80, or 100 enrolled; no work in the conference has made more solid progress than this one. Bro. Stateler is in good health, was arranging to send his twenty five-dollars to Bro. Stayley, for mission debt, and means to attend the District Conference at this place in March. By the way, I may here give the program of the District Conference as far as I have it made out, beginning Monday evening, Mar. 27th with the

1. Opening Sermon, by Rev. R. H. Schaffer, of Helena Station.

2. "Our Pulpit Against the Gross Sins of the West", Rev. T. W. Alton, Butte.

3. "Missionary Sermon" by Rev. W. O. Waggener, Stevensville.

4. The true policy of our church on this field," Rev. B. E. H. Warren, Belgrade.

5. "Methods of Work," by Rev. S. B. Tabor, Bozeman.

6. "Getting ready for a quarterly meeting." Rev. L. Bramble.

7. "The legal status of children," Rev. R. S. Clark.

8. "Pastoral work during a revival," Rev. E. J. Stanley.

9. "The value of music in church and S. S." T. T. Black.

10. "The pastor in the S. S.," by Rev. E. L. Lee.

11. "Teaching an infant class in S. S.," J. Walters.

12. "Cards and illustrations in the S. S.," J. W. Kemper.

13. "Reviewing a quarter's lessons," by Mrs. Baker, of Bozeman.

14. "Blackboard in the S. S.," by Prof. M. O. Reed.

13. "Filling our appointments." Rev. T. W. Goulder.

16. Mass meetings on Wednesday and Thursday evenings on (1.) "Christian Education and Literature, and (2.) "S. S. work" addressed by Bros Noland, Tabors, Britt, Alton, Stanley, Shaffer and others.

17 "Church Finances," by Rev. W. M. Britt.

All papers to be discussed. I have written to Bishop Haygood, and his health would not permit him to come, and then to Bishop Hendrix and his duties forbid his coming; like the farmer in the old 2nd reader, we will cut our own grain and the lark had as well begin to move her young out of the way. Fathers Stateler and Waggener are expected to be with us and take part in all the exercises and bless us with their spirit of devotion, beside some other visiting brethren who may come.

We desire most of all that this may be a great spiritual occasion for all and for this community. Now Mr. Editor, let me add to this lengthy article that another young man comes up for "local license" at Belgrade charge on next Saturday at the quarterly conference, Bro. McLaughlin, a young man of some promise. I know of no symptom more encouraging on this field than the coming up of these young brethren, to take their places in the work here. "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers;" and then pray his people who have means to send books and money to help these young brethren. Take this field for Christ.

NOT A NOVELTY!

We, at a comparatively recent period in the present chronological era, conducted a series of services at Pyrotechnical Preacher's Paradise. Immense, enormous, multitudinous congregations crowded the spacious edifice, and listened with rapt interest to our delivery, and interpretation of the word. Such wonderful crowds never before attended a meeting in that community. The meeting was on everbody's tongue, and young and old vied with each other in their attentions to the preacher. A dinner at Sister Mrs. Bonansus' is worthy of special mention. The service was rich beyond description and the menu was unsurpassed. The services at the church were not delayed more than three quarters of an hour by our lingering at the table. This was of course unavoidable. The meeting continued two weeks, and while the silvery queen of night waxed and waned, the audience constantly augmented itself. Previous engagements compelled us to close, amid a shower of tears from weeping friends. The results! Ah! What system of enumerations can calculate the sum total of the results of that gracious season! All with singular unanimity agreed that it was unquestionably beyoned all doubt, the most glorious meeting ever held in that county. Good, great good, immeasurable, incalculable good was accomplished. Besides we had the honor of baptizing Mrs. Mulliptier's triplets. It was a nice, precious, crying time, and a good fee was given the administrator. Thanks are returned to the choir who rendered such excellent selections, and thereby made our preaching much more attractive and effective.

Rev. Jonathan Edwards Solomon Peter Paul Gabriel, D. D.

P. S. We omitted to mention the gift of a lovely initial handkerchief from our dear Sister Sniveller. Sympathy, with too free flow of tears, made its use necessary at once.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, D. C., Feb. 14, 1893.

Gold has Wings. Some alarm has been felt among business men at the great outflow of gold and the small margin to "free" gold in the treasury that is of gold above the hundred million reserve. The banks have recently voluntarily paid or tendered the U. S. Treasury several millions in exchange for legal tender to strengthen the financial situation. Some say that silver is driving out gold. Secretary Foster does not seem to be alarmed, nor disposed to charge loss of gold to the silver purchase bill. Russia, Austria, France and Germany have been accumulating gold. It is said that Russia in the last year has added 130 millions to her stock. The bank of France holds nearly 350 millions, Austria has about 100 millions and is paying us one-half per cent. premium for more. There are afloat various opinions, fears and direful prophecies. Possibly the secret of the gold tide lies in the figures given below.

Mighty Armies. Russia has six million soldiers, Germany five millions, France four and one-third millions, Italy two and one-third millions, France two millions, Turkey one and one-half millions and England something over one-half a million or in all about 22 millions. These and other defenses of European governments cost 1,000 million dollars annually. It is said that Russia is filling her pockets with gold in preparation for war. This conjecture may or may not be true, but the fact is that Europe is increasing both its armies and its stock of gold. But why should this peaceful land rich as it is be alarmed? There may be danger of an unnecessary panic but there seems to be no good reason for one.

Small Army. Certainly the best of our little army of one fortieth of a million—just one twenty-fourth as large as England's and one two-hundred-and-fortieth as large as Russia's or one to every 2,400 of the population is not impoverishing the country so that it need not fear the temporary export of gold or that it cannot pay its debts in gold.

Three Per Cent. Bonds will be issued if necessary, Foster the setting and Carlisle the rising sun of the Treasury, John Sherman and prominent Democratic Senators are agreed it is said that it will be well to amend the old funding act still in force, which authorizes the Secretary to issue bonds at, 4-1-2 and 5 per cent. according to length of the term so that in his discretion he may issue bonds payable in 5 years at 3 per cent. Such power affords a safe guard against a temporary corner in gold. Somewhere from 90 to 95 per cent. of all business transactions effected without coin and upon credit. That nation which produces more than it consumes ought to have good credit. Why should Uncle Sam be afraid?

Washingtonians have subscribed about $25,000 toward inauguration expenses and subscriptions are being freely made. Inauguration ball tickets at $10.00 are now on sale and will go for towards paying bills. Already notice of the coming of 20,000 members of civilian associations has been given, beside tens of thousands of soldiers. Tammany will send 3,000 braves.

After Cleveland has been formally put in the White House and had time to name his Cabinet and fill the more important executive offices along in May the Presbyterians will take possession of the Capital and hold a General Assembly which among other things will hear the appeal against Dr. Briggs.

A Waif's View of Wealth.

A little street waif was once at the house of a great lady, and the childish eyes that had to look so sharply after daily bread, were dazzled by signs of splendor on every hand "Can you get everything you want?" the child asked the mistress of the mansion. "Yes, I think so," was the reply. "Can you buy anything you would like to have?" The lady answered, "Yes." And the child, who was of a meditative turn of mind looked at her pityingly, and said, wonderingly, "Don't you find it dull?" To the little keen mind, accustomed to live bird-like from day to day, and to rejoice over a little supply with the delight born of rarity, the aspect of continual plenty, and desires all gratified by possession, contained an idea of monotony thaseemed almost wearisome. Many an owner of a well--filled purse has found life "dull" and pronounced in the midst of luxury that all thing are vanity; but the hand that knows how wisely to distribute and scatter abroad the bounty possessed will never be without interest in life, will never miss the sunshine that abides for kind and unselfish hearts.—The Quiver.

SOME OF THE FENCES on the Alfred Jordon farm near Petersburg, Illinois, are made of rails split by Abraham Lincoln. When a young man the latter boarded with Mr. Gordon and paid his board by splitting rails for the farmer.

There is not an European government which has not before it, in one form or another, this problem of increasing gravity: "How to put down drunkenness."

A lofty ideal is essential to the highest living. He who would make progress for himself, or who would help others upward, must have clearly before his mind the ideal of the best conceivable attainment.

Next to the Moravians comes the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, in the army of missionary workers. They have 570 churches and 185,000 members and last year they contributed $400,000 to the cause of missions, and gained 600 converts.

What Would I do?

If I were a rose on the garden wall,
I'd look so fair and grow so tall;
I'd scatter perfume far and wide.
Of all the flowers I'd be the pride,
That's what I'd do, if I were you,
O, little rose!

If I were a bird with a nest in a tree,
I would sing a song so glad and free,
That birds in gilded cages near
Would pause my wild, sweet notes to hear.
That's what I'd do, if I were you,
O, gay, wild bird!

Fair little maid, if I were you,
I should always try to be good and true.
I'd be the merriest, sweetest child
On whom the sunshine ever smiled.
That's what I'd do, if I were you,
Dear little maid.

CHRIST OUR LORD.

Jesus Christ is the most certain, the most sacred, the most glorious, of all facts; arrayed in a beauty and majesty which throws the "starry heavens above us and the moral law within us" into obscurity, and fills us truly with ever-growing reverence and awe. He shines forth with the self-evidencing light of the noonday sun. He is too great, too pure, too perfect, to have been invented by any sinful and erring man. His character and claims are confirmed by the sublimest doctrine, the purest ethics, the mightiest miracles, the grandest spiritual kingdom, and are daily and hourly exhibited in the virtues and graces of all who yield to the regenerating and sanctifying power of his spirit and example. The historical Christ meets and satisfies all our intellectual and moral wants. The soul, if left to its noblest impulses and aspirations, instinctively turns to him, as the needle to the magnet, as the flower to the sun, as the panting hart to the fresh fountain. We are made for him, and "our heart is without rest until it rests in him." He commands our assent, he wins our admiration, he overwhelms us with adoring wonder. We cannot look upon him without spiritual benefit. We cannot think of him without being elevated above all that is low and mean, and encouraged to all that is good and noble. The very hem of his garment is healing to the touch. One hour spent in his communion outweighs all the pleasures of sin. He is the most precious and indispensable gift of a merciful God to a fallen world. In him are the treasures of true wisdom, in him the fountain of pardon and peace, in him the only substantial hope and comfort in this world and that which is to come. Mankind could better afford to lose the whole literature of Greece and Rome, of Germany and France, of England and America, than the story of Jesus of Nazareth. Without him history is a dreary waste, an inextricable enigma, a chaos of facts without a meaning, connection, and aim; with him it is a beautiful harmonious revelation of God, the slow but sure unfolding of a plan of infinite wisdom and love; all ancient history converging to his coming, all modern history receiving from him its higher life and impulse. He is the glory of the past, the life of the present, the hope of the future. We cannot even understand ourselves without him. According to an old Jewish proverb, "The secret of man is the secret of the Messiah."

He is the great central light of history, as a whole; and, at the same time, the light of every soul. He alone can solve the mystery of our being, and fulfill all our intellectual desires after truth, all our moral aspirations after goodness and holiness, and the longing of our feelings after peace and happiness. Not for all the wealth and wisdom of this world would I weaken the faith of the humblest Christian in his divine Lord and Savior; but if, by the grace of God, I could convert a single skeptic to a childlike faith in Him who lived and died for me, and for all, I would feel that I had not lived in vain.—Dr. Schaff.

A Charitable Enterprise.

Mrs. X. lives in a crowded suburb of the great metropolis. When the late cold spell began it came to her ears that a great many poor people were buying coal at twelve and thirteen cents a pail, thus paying at the rate of nine dollars a ton, when the rate by the ton is only six.

There wasn't time to organize a society for their relief, so she organized herself into a society and proceeded at once to work. She hired a shed for three dollars a month, hired a man to take charge of it, and laid in a supply of coal, on which the dealers allowed her a small reduction. Then she sent out word that coal could be bought at eight cents a pailful, instead of thirteen. Of course, all the poor were glad to buy of her, and for the three weeks the "society" has been in working order she has nearly covered her expenses, and saved many nickels for her poor patrons to buy bread with.

Revivals a Necessity.

Where no religious revival has occurred for years the church may appear to flourish outwardly, but there is sure to be a lack of spiritual religion. This may be seen in the fact that something has been substituted for religious work and spiritual life. When the spiritual life of a people declines, the need of something to attract the young people begins to be felt. In some cases concerts, literary entertainments and social meetings are introduced. It sometimes happens that these things are employed on the Sabbath in place of the regular worship. Some of these exercises may be unobjectionable at proper times and places; but when they become a substitute for religious services and religious work they are idols. Those who promote them flatter themselves that they are doing church work, when, in too many cases, they are bringing idols into the temple of God.

Brevities for the Thoughtful.

Without self-sacrifice there can be no blessedness, neither in earth nor in heaven. He that loveth his life will lose it. He that hateth his life in this paltry, selfish, luxurious, hypocritical world shall keep it to life eternal.—Charles Kingsley.

We have but to name God before sorrow, and it changes color; name Him before burdens, and they grow less; name Him before the vanity of life and it disappears. The whole sphere and scene of life is changed, lifted into a realm of power and wisdom and gladness.—Munger.

We walk out into the mystery fearless because we trust in Thee. We face the great emergency with our hearts full of vital questions that cannot be answered. We leave them all with Thee, knowing that Thou wilt cherish our wistful aspirations toward Him who has loved and redeemed us. We would know many things that Thou hast not revealed, but we can only love and trust and wait.—Madame Willard's Last Family Prayer.

The beloved Daniel chose rather to lie in the den of lions than shamefully desert the cause of the Lamb. Shall not we, for His sake, bear the wrath of man, who for our sakes bore the wrath of God? Though obedience be better than sacrifice, yet sometimes for a man to sacrifice himself is the best obedience. He that loses a base life for Christ shall hereafter find a better life in Christ.—The Rev. Thos. Secker.

This Bethany loyalty is the simple requirement of religion. Not one cent, not one moment, not one loving impulse, not one thought, not one syllable of a creed, more than comes within the range of your possibilities is expected; but all of this is expected; nothing less will do. God asks for no more, but all of this he does expect, and man has no right to evade it. Let duty be its own reward, love its own justification. "She hath done what she could"—this is the fullness of Christian excellence; it is the ultimate standard of religion.—The Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones.

Lord Jesus, Thy way is narrow and painful, and despised by the world; do Thou, therefore, enable me to walk in it, and with meekness and patience to bear the contempt of the world; "for the disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord." Let Thy servant be continually exercised in the study and imitation of Thy most holy life, in which all His perfection and blessedness is centered. Whatever else I hear or read or think of, gives me neither instruction nor delight.—Thomas a Kempis.

Every great sorrow is in a certain sense a lonely sorrow. It drives a man into the fastnesses of himself. No friends, however near and dear, can quite penetrate to the sacred chamber of his grief. They may come so near that he may catch the sound of their footsteps, and get a vague, sweet comfort out of the sense of their hovering presence; but none can enter and raise him up, whispering, "Peace, peace!" Only Christ can do that. He is the one guest that can enter the sacred chamber of a great sorrow. The soul's sense of loneliness yields to him. The heart's sensitive reserve gives way. Christ enters and thenceforth sorrow takes on a new meaning and aspect.

The moral influences of the minister will immensely add to his pulpit power or counteract. We must live well if we would preach well. The "moral pressure" of ministers, of which we read in modern writings, must come from the moral qualities of the preacher. We cannot leave the ministerial character in the pulpit or the vestry, any more than we can our complexion. God can and often does employ the less gifted servant who is full of the Holy Ghost. How successful some of our less known but consecrated brethren have been! And in them we see the words of the Lord fulfilled: "Them that honor me I will honor." For he constantly reminds us "that it is not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." When we were candidates for this ministry it was asked of each, "Has he gifts and grace and fruit?" It might be well if we sometimes, before God, asked the question again, each one for himself, and faced the answer.—Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.

It behooves us, then, to cultivate the gifts and preserve the state of mind and heart that will best fit us for our life work of being "embassadors for Christ." Let us use every gift that God has entrusted to us by which we may better illustrate and enforce the truth. Whether science, history, imagination, anecdote; experience, current incident, let all be directed to one end. It was said of Cannon Liddon that he was "not above telling a story if it would suit his purpose." We should be "above" nothing by which we can drive home the truth, or by which we can "pull" men "out of the fire." But an essential condition of success is prayer—private, protracted, prevailing prayer. The early Methodist preachers were men of prayer. They were powerful on their knees, and because they had power with God they also had power with men. Of one, who but recently passed away, it was said that on Monday morning he began to plead with God for the next Sunday night in particular, and he rarely preached without results.—The Rev. Henry Bone.

HOME MISSION CLAIMS.

There is before us a paper signed by Bishop Vincent and sent out by the Missionary Committee of the M. E. church as an appeal to the people in behalf of Home Missions. It is in such complete harmony with our sentiments that we would copy it into these columns if we had the space. We give one or two paragraphs:

"While we are in duty bound to extend the missionary agencies of our church to the remotest parts of the earth, the opportunities of the field at home create an imperative demand which we dare not refuse to consider, a demand more urgent to-day than ever before.

In America the 'foreign' field is at 'home.' We ponder the Master's commission, 'Go into all the world,' and we lift our eyes to find 'all the world' pouring its populations into our open gates. We plan to go to them, and lo, they meet us more than half way. Our own coasts are crowded with the foreign subjects we cross the sea to seek and to save."

These people have claims upon us just as great as if they had remained on the other side of the ocean. They come with foreign prejudices, and practices, and need the enlightening and refining influence of the gospel, not only to save them, but to mould them into sympathy with our institutions and to save us from the corrupting influence of their heathenish habits. Besides, many of them return to their own land, and if they are converted here, they become powerful allies in helping to carry the glad tidings back to their homes beyond the seas.

Then, we owe it to the people of our own land, who have left home and gone out to the frontiers, to follow and furnish them with the gospel which alone can save them from the vices to which so many fall victims, while battling against the difficulties of border life. They are our own kit and kin, our own flesh and blood, and we cannot disregard their entreaties and remain guiltless.

During our attendance at the sessions of the three conferences in the Northwest, last fall, our heart was deeply stirred at the story of destitution that prevails in some localities, and the earnest entreaties of the people to send them preachers. One preacher has a circuit seventy-five miles in extent, and beyond that there is an entire county with several thousand people in it and not a minister among them, even to bury their dead. They have sent messages to our brother, saying, "for God's sake come over and preach to us." This is only one case out of many. These people can be reached by us, and we need the spiritual grace and strength that will come to us by self-sacrificing efforts to see them; and ere long they will have acquired comfortable homes, with sufficient means to help us in sending the gospel into regions still beyond.

The M. E. church has shown greater wisdom than we have in providing for its home field, spending about four dollars in this work to five in the foreign field, while our General Board has sent six dollars abroad to one spent on the frontier of our own land. This is not good management. If we would keep up our ability to help in the foreign work we should husband the resources lying at our doors.

Now that the burdensome debt is about gone, to return no more, we trust, and opportunity comes for enlargement, we earnestly plead with our brethren who are in authority to consider the claims of our western work and see whether or not it demands a more liberal support, comparatively, than it has heretofore received.

—o—

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS.

Miss Anna Gordon, Miss Willards's private secretary, and who has charge of the juvenile department of the W. C. T. U., whom we had the pleasure of meeting in Butte City several years ago, has immortalized herself by suggesting a children's fountain, a Columbian gift to the city of Chicago, from the temperance children all over the world. It is to represent, in bronze, says the "Union Signal," a little child offering a cup of cold water to the passer-by, the overflow falling into a trough for the animals. It will be executed by the noted London sculptor, George E. Wade, and will be most charming to all beholders and beneficiaries. This fountain is to be a part of the temperance exhibit at the World's Fair, and the names of all donors will be recorded in a book kept for the purpose, in the temperance archives of the temple. Every little child is requested to send ten cents, with his or her name, at once to Miss Anna Gordon, Evanston, Ill. That was a happy thought and worthy the head and heart of that modest little lady. May the movement prove a great success. The dimes will go from the juvenile portion of this writer's home, with three names for the roll. Would that the fountain could be supplied from the crystal streams that flow down from the snow-clad mountains of Montana.

At this writing, Feb. 28th, Rev. W. O. Waggener is engaged in a protracted meeting at Corvallis, assisted by Rev. T. W. Alton, of Butte, who has just arrived. The cold wave that has just come to these parts interferes somewhat with the congregation. But the attendance is good, and we are hopeful of a refreshing time. Brother Alton reports the work at Butte in a prosperous condition.

The Eleventh Census of the United States will be completed by the end of the year. It will have cost $8,100,000, while the Tenth Census only cost $5,000,000. But the latter is said to be of much greater scope and more elaborate in detail than any before it, and hence will be of much greater value.

A number of our brethren over in Washington, Idaho and Oregon are sending us lists of subscribers, which greatly encourage and help us. Will not all our friends, especially the preachers, help us to circulate the "Methodist, especially when so many persons testify to the help it afford them? Brethren, it is your paper as much as it is ours. It is time you were acting out that resolution you helped to adopt at Conference. Let us have one hundred new names next week.

Rev. M. V. Howard sends a thrilling report from the Pendleton District. A hundred accessions since conference, some charges doubling their membership, a new church, a new parsonage, and preparations for greater enlargement. We rejoice with our brethren in the success that the Lord is giving them, and pray that it may continue.

Brother E. P. Dyer, a layman, writes from Spokane, Washington, and says that they have recently closed a protracted meeting in our church there, which resulted in 14 accessions, and three children were baptized. His letter of reminiscence calls up memories that are very precious to this writer, and also brings out some events in the early history of our work in the West that will be of interest to many persons. It is remarkable how one little incident will suggest others of a kindred character.

Mr. Brett H. Shaeffer, son of Rev. R. H. Schaeffer, pastor of our church in Helena, recently spent nearly a month with us in our home near Corvallis. He is a young man of excellent habits, pleasing manners, and indomitable energy, and his stay with us will be remembered with pleasure and his future career watched with much interest. We wish him great success in the highest and truest sense of that word. We rejoice that he is recovering from the illness that threatened him while in our valley.

Rev. R. H. Shaeffer writes that "church affairs are running smoothly in Helena. Congregations are catching up again." We wonder if that new furnace, which was recently placed in the church there, has something to do with it. We suspect it does. They are great institutions, and we would that there was one in every church, and would suggest that a good place for it would be near the pulpit. Such red hot sermons as Brother Shaeffer preaches ought to warm any church, and fill it, in the coldest weather.

A copy of the printed minutes of the first session of the Japan Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, held at Kobe, Japan, July 20th-27th, 1892, is on our table. It is a neatly printed pamphlet of 60 pages, bearing the imprint of "E. Nam & Co," Kobe. The official roll numbers sixteen names, four of whom are natives. Henry G. Hawkins and Eigibo Abo were admitted on trial, and K. Usaki, E. Nakayama and Y. Tanaka remain on trial. W. A. Wilson and Y. Yoshioka were admitted into full connection, and the latter elected deacon. J. W. Lambuth had died.

There are in the conference two local preachers; members, foreign, 18; native, 494; infants baptized, 22; adults, 118; number of Sunday-schools, 38; teachers, 81; scholars, 1535; there had been $457.99 contributed for missions and $288.15 for church extension. There are 5 churches, valued at $5,200, and 2 parsonages, valued at $3,-175. The educational statistics are: schools 20; students 562; raised for ministerial education, $225. The next session of the conference will be held at Hiroshima, Japan. Our work in Japan shows wonderful vitality. This conference marked the sixth anniversary of our occupancy of the field. It is a somewhat striking coincidence that the minutes of the first annual conference in Japan should contain the memoir of the venerable founder of the mission.

What a joy to Dr. Lambuth to have been at that conference, but he was called to a greater joy, "to be present with the Lord."

We are pleased to note among the workers the names of three brethren whom we know in the flesh, W. A. Davis of the Missouri conference, N. W. Utly, whom we met at St. Louis and also at Nashville, and Y. Yoshioka, whom we also met at Vanderbilt last spring and learned to love. We feel a special interest in the Japan conference and pray God's richest blessings upon the labors of our consecrated works there.

The "Columbus Memorial" sent out by the "Weekly Missoulian" is the neatest thing in the way of a souvenir that we have seen. It contains cuts of the grounds and principal buildings of the World's Columbian Exposition, with much useful information concerning the same, besides excellent cuts and descriptions of Missoula and surrounding country.

———

The "Preacher's Magazine," for February, edited by Mark Guy Pearse and Arthur E. Gregory, Wilbur B. Ketchum, publisher, New York, is before us. It contains some articles on interesting topics; among them are, "Present Day Preaching,'" "Moses, His Life and Lessons," "Inspiration of the Scriptures," "Extempore Preaching and Read Sermons," "How Men Get Their Sermons,"" Christian Perfection," etc.

———

The Columbia Conference Annual is a tastefully executed pamphlet of 31 pages, containing the minutes of the last session held at Albany, Oregon, October 5-9, 1892, together with the roll of members, official boards, reports of committees, etc. It comes with the compliments of our Brother, Rev. J. L. Futrell. The brethren have shown great energy and excellent taste in getting up this annual, which they are able to distribute free of charge throughout the conference.

We had the honor and great pleasure of being a visitor at the last session of the Columbia Conference. We were deeply interested in all its proceedings, and were wonderfully drawn to the brethren. Their trials are much like ours. They have an extensive and promising field, but, alas, there is a lack of men and money to properly cultivate it. We have copied a portion of the report of the Conference Board of Missions into our columns. Would that it could be read by every member of our great church. Our brethren are doing a great and good work on our Western coast. They need reenforcements. The land is great and large and there remaineth very much ground to be possessed. In the name of our Lord and Master, let us help them to go up and possess it.

The Illustrated Souvenir Edition of the "Epworth Messenger," commemorating the opening of the new First Methodist Church in Memphis, Tenn., is a charming number, especially to everyone acquainted with, or interested in, the history of Memphis Methodism. It contains a history of the church, the Sunday-school, a cut of the old church buildings, and also of the beautiful and imposing new structure, besides sketches and portraits of the various bishops, pastors, official boards, and other officers and individuals who have been, or are, connected with the First Methodist church there. We recognize a number of familiar faces, those of our good friends, Dr. Steel, the former pastor. and Dr. Miller, the present pastor, being not the least prominent. The beautiful souvenir will be invaluable to all members of the First church in Memphis. We are not surprised to learn that J. R. Pepper had something to do in getting up this edition of the "Messenger." He is one of the most wide awake workers in Methodism to-day. If there were just one such layman—cultivated, consecrated, and full of consuming zeal for Christ's cause—in every annual conference, what a mighty impetus would be given to our work. We recognize the picture of the old church, in which we attended a session of the Memphis Conference in 1884. May the glory of the latter house exceed the glory of the former. We presume the next session of our General Conference will be held in the new church, in May, 1894.

———

Intertwining of God's Plans.

Let any man once give faith to the biblical thought of God as his personal friend, and carry it back to the review of his own life from his infancy up, and he will find the evidence of divine love to him, as if to him only, coming in upon his soul like a flood of many waters. The invisible hand is seen in such things as these. I select at random from one life only—an old song which the mother sang in the Sunday twilight; a tree, a lake, a stream, a mountain, which were more than friends to our boyhood; a certain chance interview with a friend, which was rich in life-long results; a speech heard on a certain festive day; the sight of the great man who first awakened great aspirations within us; the sight of a good man who first made religion a reality to us; a certain book come upon at haphazard; a certain sermon heard long years ago, or one sentence in it, or the text only; the death of a college friend, which first made heaven a fact to us; the mild reproof of a certain saintly woman; the first lesson in practical astronomy; a Christian hymn sung somewhere in the mountains; the gift of a rosebud from a hand now still forever; a certain conversation with a stranger in the cars; last words from a mother's deathbed; a certain prayer heard when homesick in a foreign land; the mysterious delays which prevented us from embarking on board the ship that went down at sea; a look at the bay of Naples; an hour in the Colosseum at Rome; the hour spent in the "closes" of Edinburgh, where Chalmers labored; the Lord's Supper at Lucerne.

Can we not all recall similar events and circumstances, some of them too minute to mean much in the rehearsal, but which have been so inwrought into our subsequent life that we cannot but break forth sometimes into a carol of thanksgiving at the thought of them? I know a man whom the perfume of mignonette in the month of August moves to ejaculatory prayer, because it is so associated with a certain day and hour in August of a certain year in the critical period of his youth, when, walking in his father's garden, he gave his heart to Christ.

That wounded soldier, who rebuked the winking stars on the field of Shiloh, bethought him a hymn which he used to sing when a boy in the Sunday school. Something moved him to sing it again, and he broke out with:

When I can read my title clear
To mansions in the skies, etc.

When the third line was reached another voice joined his, then another, and another; and when he began the second stanza, more than three hundred wounded men, some of them with faltering and dying accents, and again the gray and blue together wafted that Christian song over that field of blood. Was there no provision of a divine eye, no planning of a divine hand, in teaching them that hymn of holy triumph long years before? Was there no prompting of thoughtful and tender kindness in their being moved to sing it when most they needed it? To many of them, doubtless, it was more than the wings of angels, bearing them up to the opening heavens. We cannot convince a man of the reality of these awakening and creative influences in other lives, who has not felt them in his own. If I take a handful of steel filings, and hold over them my ebony ruler, there is no motion. They lie still and dead. But if I take a magnet, that iron with a soul in it, and draw it slowly over them, every solitary particle springs in response, and clings to the electric metal as to a friend. So let a man whose faith in God is wooden review of his own life and he may find nothing suggestive to such faith. But once magnetize him with the will to see, and he cannot find so much as the space for a needle's point on which the love God has not left its impress.—Prof. Austin Phelps, Anover Theological Seminary.

Proverbs 23: 15 23.

LESSON BIBLE READING.

DRUNKENNESS.

Forbidden (Luke 21: 34; Eph. 5:18).
A fruit of the flesh (Dan. 5:1-4; Gal. 5: 19 21).
Leads to poverty (Prov. 21: 17; 23 21).
A source of trouble (Prov. 23:29-30).
Leads to irreligion (Isa. 5: 11, 12; Hos. 7: 5).
Associated with all evil (Rom. 13:13; I Peter 4. 3).
Precludes from heaven (I Cor. 6: 9, 10).

LESSON SURROUNDINGS.

BOOK OF PROVERBS: DIVISIONS.—The book cannot be analyzed in the usual manner, by topics, since it consists so largely of unconnected sayings. Yet it contains marks of division easily recognized: 1. Chapters 1-9; 2. Chapters 10-24; 3. Chapters 25-29; 4. Chapter 30; 5. Chapter 31. The first division is a preface in praise of wisdom, more connected in thought than most of the following chapters. The second division is mainly (chaps. 10 to 22: 16) a collection of single proverbs. The third, collected in the days of Hezekiah, also consists of single proverbs, but the style differs from that of the previous division. The fourth and fifth are assigned to Agur and Lemuel respectively, and will be discussed in connection with lesson IX., second quarter. The second division is usually subdivided: 1. The unconnected proverbs (chaps. 10 to 22: 16); 2 A more connected series of precepts (chaps. 22: 17 to 24: 22), to which is added a brief collection of unconnected sayings (chap. 24: 23 34), introduced by the phrase, "These also are sayings of the wise." From this section the lesson is taken.

AUTHOR.—Solomon is the chief, but not the sole, author of the Book of Proverbs. The book itself indicates that collections were made at different dates, and the proverbs of other authors are explicitly included The date and authorship of the section from which the lesson is taken has been much discussed. It has peculiarities of form, but nothing decisive of the question. It resembles, more than the intervening division, the first part of the book,—chapters 1-9.

CONNECTION.—The section chapters 22: 17 to 24:22 consists of a brief introduction (chap. 22: 17-21) of admonitions of a practical character, more extended in form than the previous proverbs. Especially prominent are the warnings against drunkenness, which are given most fully in chapter 23: 29-35. In chapter 24 there are brief practical maxims, closing with a graphic description of the possessions of the sluggard.

CONTENTS.—The lesson includes three parts: A description of the joy of a parent in a wise son (vs. 15-18); a warning against the company of the dissolute (vs. 19-21); an exhortation to reverence for parents (vs. 22, 23), which continues to the close of verse 25. The lesson is made up of irregular stanzas, but the parallelism of Hebrew poetry can be recognized throughout.

CRITICAL NOTES.

BY PROF. WILLIS J. BEECHER, D. D.

This is not the place for studying the Book of Proverbs as a book, but we need to take just a glance at the book in order to place the lesson in its surroundings. Notice, then, that the book has five inscriptive titles (Prov. i. 1; x. 1; xxv. 1. xxx. 1; xxxi. 1). If this statement is blind to any one, it will become clear f he will turn to these references and read them. In addition, there is a descriptive title, which is most closely translated, Words of wise [men], and which is three times repeated (Prov. i. 6; xxii. 17; xxiv. 23). Notice that in xxii. 17, the Revised Version recognizes the title by printing it with a wide space before it; and in xxiv. 23, both by the wide space, and by printing the title separately.

This part of the book, therefore (xxii. 17. to xxiv. 22), is a little volume of wise sayings by itself. It is not made up entirely of single proverbs, but contains longer sections, and has some degree of continuity. The person who is presented as putting forth these "words of wise men" we will call the teacher. He introduces himself in the prologue (xxii. 17-21), and brings what he has to say to a careful conclusion in xxiv. 21-22. As the best possible preparation for studying our lesson, read this little volume through four or five times, carefully noting the changes in the thought, as they succeed one another.

Wisdom Forbids Mistaken Ambitions.—Somebody's son is urged to be wise, for the sake of the joy that he will thus give his parents. He is then reminded that, if he is wise, his ambitions will be different from those of sinners. They will be influenced by the fear of Jehovah, and by thoughts of the future (vs. 15-18).

Verse 15.—My son: Strictly speaking, the person here who says "my" is the teacher,—the one who utters the whole of this little volume of the "words of wise men." But the difference is very slight between this idea and the idea that it is Impersonated Wisdom, who speaks here as in chapter 1. And whether we think of the person speaking as the teacher or Impersonated Wisdom, in either case he speaks in the character of parent to the person addressed. So we have here the same reason in favor of being wise that we have in verses 22 24, 25. Any one ought to be willing to take pains, for the sake of giving pleasure to his father and mother.—Wise: Wisdom, as the term is used in the Book of Proverbs, consists in the best use of our knowing and thinking powers for regulating our conduct. Religious living, or moral uprightness, apart from knowing or thinking, would not amount to wisdom. Wide thinking and knowing, apart from conduct, would not be wisdom. Wisdom deals with personal manners, with prudence and economy, with the adaptation of means to ends, but it deals with these thoughtfully, and in view of higher moral values. The wise man, in short, is the man who has an intelligent, enlightened philosophy of living.

Verse 16.—Right things: Wisdom in the heart will show itself in the speech. To say what one ought to say, and nothing else, is to give proof that one is wise. So the two lines of verse 16 are simply a repetition, in reversed order, of the two lines of verse 15.

Verses 17, 18.—Envy: If we retain this English word here, we must understand it in its active sense, rather than in the sense in which it indicates mere feeling. Be not emulous of sinners. Let not your ambitions be the same with theirs, but let yours be such as are consistent with the fear of Jehovah. The fear of Jehovah is the beginning of wisdom (9, 10), and you will not show wisdom by being ambitious for something inconsistent with this fear. Doubtless the Teacher has especially in mind the ambitions for sensual indulgence which he rebukes in the succeeding sections.—End: In Revised Version "reward." The true rendering is that of the margin of the Revised Version, "sequel," or "future." Every act has its sequel, its consequences, its future. Remember this when you frame your ambitions.

Wisdom Forbids Over-Indulgence in Eating and Drinking.—Perhaps this section (vs. 19, 21) is to be regarded as a specification under the one just examined. Among the wrong ambitions of sinners are those that find their fulfillment in dissipation, in riotous feasting; and he who is truly wise will eschew these. This section differs essentially from verses 29 35, where drunkenness is specifically spoken of. A person who unduly exalts mere eating and drinking as an aim in life is amenable to the rebuke in this section, even if he never becomes drunk. The section begins like the preceding and the following sections, by urging upon the learner the pursuit of wisdom, and it intimates that the vices against which it cautions him are inconsistent with that pursuit.

Verse 19.—Guide thine heart in the way: This is best explained by referring it to verse 17. When thy heart is disposed to emulate sinners in their ambitions, then control thy heart. Let it not follow its foolish longing and go out of the proper course. Guide it; keep it correctly in the way. Practice self-mastery.

Verse 20, 21.—Wine-bibbers: Two words in the Hebrew, one of them an unusual word. To exhibit this fact, we might translate "guzzlers of wine."—Drunkard: If we translate "guzzler," we exhibit two facts: First, that this is the same with the word used in the previous verse; and, second, that it is different from the words commonly used to denote intoxication. Drowsiness: The word is used only here. Apparently, it denotes the stupidity induced by excessive eating and drinking. There may be here the picture of a man intoxicated from alcohol; but at all events, it is not a picture of violent or public intoxication. It is that of a person who makes eating, drinking, and sleeping the great aim of life. It is specified that one who does this is not likely to succeed financially. It is implied that he is still less likely to gain successes of a higher sort.

Wisdom Demands Righteousness.—This is really the central thought in verses 22 25. For this section, like those that precede and follow, presents two ideas: First, the desirableness of wisdom, especially since one can make his parents happy by being wise; and, second, some prominent characteristic in which wisdom exhibits itself. Here the characteristic is brought out in verse 24 a. The truly wise person will necessarily be a righteous person. This point, however, calls for no further attention, because it is beyond the limits of the lesson.

Verses 12, 23. Thy mother when she is old: Do not neglect to impress this motive deeply. Buy.....and sell it not: Here are four good investments.—Truth: Not "the" truth, but truth. The Hebrew has no article here. Buying the truth is a good thing; but the good thing here spoken of is buying truth, any truth, all truth, so far as you have the opportunity. There can be no wisdom without knowledge, and nothing can be really known but truth.—Instruction: Commonly translated "correction," as in verse 13. Consistency would require the Revisers to put "correction" in the margin here, as in verse 12. Better translate by "discipline." It is especially the training that sets us right when we make mistakes, and enables us to avoid mistakes. Truth, wisdom, discipline, understanding, are good stocks to invest in. They never depreciate.—S. S. Times.

In Persia from Karachi to Bagdad, among the populous villages of the Persian Gulf, of the Tigris and Euphrates, throughout Arabia and Southwest Persia, there is not a missionary, and from Bagdad to Teheran, not a missionary. The great oasis with 680 mountain villages craving medical advice is never visited.

In 1849 there were only 12 medical missionaries in all the non-Christian world. Now there are 400 and every year sees an addition to the number.

Along The Line.

FROM PENDELTON DISTRICT.

Dear Brother:—We love to get the "Motana Methodist." Your visits in person to our conference have given you a place in our hearts that cannot be expressed, save in the support of the "Methodist." Our work here is being strengthened, and the three-year-old-child, (the East Columbia Conference), is large of his age, in good health, and with training and care, will arrive at the measure of the statue of the fullness of Christ. More than a hundred have been added to the church on this district since conference, one church to be dedicated, March 25,

Eagle Valley, (wish you could be there), [so do we, most heartily.—Editor.] One parsonage has been built, at Weston, with six rooms, finished and the preacher is at home in it.

Some charges have almost doubled in numbers, while others are only holding their own, preparing, by strengthening what they already have, to move forward in the future. Young pastors seem to be carrying the banner, so far, this year—Brothers Bell, Gibbs, Barnhart and Kirk receiving more into the church by conversion than any others, but doing no more faithful work than the other pastors.

I am glad you met my father and mother. Your kindly notice of his departure did us good. Surely we have been bereaved. We are poorer, heaven is richer. Many of our best friends are in heaven. One day we shall go to meet them. "Won't that be a happy meeting, on the other shore?"

In love,
M. V. Howard.

FROM BUTLER'S, S. C.

Dear Brother Stanley:—We are settled at last on a circuit in the bounds of the South Carolina conference. It is a delightful charge with four churches, the kind of a circuit Bishop Keener said he would like to serve. I would not swap work with him to-day unless he would give me "boot." There is a nice parsonage, well furnished, with six acres of ground attached. [They surely expect the preacher to make his own living.—Editor.] Our health continually improves. Praise God. Pray for us. Love to all friends in the Northwest. Send paper to Butler's S. C.

Fred St. Clair.

Our brother ought to get well soon in such a place as that. But we fear that he will be strongly tempted to remain there. But we would not swap places with him to-day, with all the "boot" he might offer.—Editor.

FROM BROTHER FLOWERS.

I have just returned from my old home, the place where I first saw the light of this world. I will leave here soon to visit my brother who lives in Wilkerson county, 20 miles from Hamburg, south. I have gotten two subscribers for the "Montana Methodist," whose names I send. I hope to get others. I want to have it scattered down here so that the people may learn something of what we are doing in Montana in church work, for they know but little of what is being accomplished there.

We are having a great deal of rain, and mud, mud; oh, the mud. I traveled 20 miles yesterday in a buggy, with one horse to draw it, and was five hours making the trip. I have preached six sermons, baptized nine children and one adult since I came here. So you see I have not been idle. When I have time I will write at greater length about my work, travels, etc., since I left home.

I want to know how the weather is out west, and the snow-drifts along the line of the railroad. I want to return about the last of March, if travel is not blocked by the snowdrifts. I want to know that the way is clear before I start.

We are very well. I hope you are not snowed in with that eighteen inch snowfall.

T. W. Flowers
Hamburg, Miss., Feb. 17.

We are all right up here in Montana. The eighteen inches of snow was a great blessing to our country, and did no damage except to the herds of stock whose cruel owners are too careless to provide feed for them. Our brother had better be concerned about his own safety and comfort, and see that he gets out of those lower regions before he is overwhelmed with the floods of waters or swallowed up in the swamps or devoured by the alligators or the gallinippers. We are glad to know that he has not been idle. It is just like him. There is not a lazy bone in his body. We shall look for a long list of subscribers to the "Methodist" from Mississippi soon.—Editor.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM SPOKANE, WASH.

ANOTHER REMINISCENCE.

Mr. Editor:—Sometime ago I saw an article in the "Methodist" from yourself, in regard to the church building at Waterville, Kan., and as I had something to do with the building of the church I felt inclined to give my experience, but as I am no writer I had almost abandoned the idea; but I see in the last number of your paper an article from Rev. Joseph King, which carried my mind still farther back in the history of the church in that country. And my memory goes still back of Brother King's day on the work. I go back to 1854 or '55 when father Stateler preached at my father's house on the Big Blue river, I think he was the first southern Methodist preacher that preached in that country. Some time after that there was a class organized at my father's house, and Bro. A. Williams sent on the work. N. Scarrett was the presiding elder. Our preachers after that were Dorcy, Millice and J. O. Foresman. Then after that, I think Brothers King and Duncan, and then the war, and about that time the flags began to fly over our meetings, that Bro. King speaks of. Then there was a time when we had no preacher—dark days. This takes me to the Little Blue river. There we kept up our organization under the name of the "Apostolic Church," so as to keep the little flock together. This organization was headed by my father, Rev. S. D. Dyer, and Bro. P. W. Duncan. We had preaching every Sunday, and no flags. Then, in 1865 or '66 Bro. H. H. Hedgepeth came to our relief. We were strangers and he took us in. Now comes your time, Bro. Stanley, Brother Hedgepeth went away. There we were again. All we could do was to await developments. Some weeks after, late one afternoon, I had killed a hog and was finishing my job, when a boy rode up, and he spoke. Then I spoke. Then we both spoke, and as we spoke he told me that he was the preacher sent out to take charge of the work. I was sorry for the boy, and he was sorry for us. But this state of mind did not last long; for the good meetings we had, the conversions, and the accessions to the church, soon drove away all sorrow. Do you remember the good old Northern sister who would not come to meeting because there was too much "South"? At last she came, and the first night she shouted. Those were the best meetings I ever saw, notwithstanding they were in log cabins and frame shacks.

The boy spoken of above is the present editor of the "Montana Methodist." I started in to say something about the church at Waterville, but I think of so much when I think of that part of Kansas where I was a boy and a young man, and where I was converted, and joined the church, I can point to the very place and remember the song they sang at the time, which commences, "There is a spot to me more dear than native vale or mountain," etc.), and where five years afterward, in that county, I was married, and seven children were born to us, three of whom are now resting beneath the clods of the Little Blue valley, but not forever.

I may at some future time speak of the Waterville church. I write this to you, Brother Stanley. I do not know that it is fit to publish. I never did much writing for the papers. But it will do for the waste-basket.

Yours truly,
E. P. Dyer.

Hope is a star of great lustre.

FROM HIGHWOOD, MONT.

Brother Stanley:—For a long time I have been calculating to renew my subscription to the "Methodist," especially since it has become a weekly paper. It has improved wonderfully, and I for one am willing to raise the subscription price at least one-half. (All right brother, we do not care if you raise it another half also, and would have no objection to a few hundred other subscribers doing likewise. It would help the "manager" very materially to manage the money matters of the "Methodist," but we do not exact it.— Editor.) The first time I go to the Falls (Great Falls), with a load of "spuds,'" of which I have quite a quantity for market, I will remit. The snow is now (Feb. 13,) 18 inches in the valley, and from 3 to 4 feet deep in the timber.

But according to my judgment religion is at a low ebb in this community. There are so many professors and so few possessors. I mean by this, that at our prayer meetings we cannot get them to talk, sing or pray. Talk to them about the operation of the Spirit and they will say, "oh, yes, let me see; does the Spirit bear me witness, directly, that I am a child of God?" Here comes the hesitancy. Talk to me plain, that I may examine myself daily before my God, that I may keep ever near the cross. Here is the trouble —so few spiritual Christians. Give us some good old-fashioned class meetings and revivals. We want to see them in Montana. (Amen. Let them come.—Editor.)

E. Nottingham.

FROM ST. JOSEPH, MO.

I am glad to see that your work in the West is on the upgrade. There is one thing in which I do think our head leaders do wrong, that is, taking our best preachers and making them presidents of colleges and editors of papers. I for one, think that is the laymen's work, and if I am ever permitted to sit in the General Conference that is the way I will cast my vote, and there are many others who think just as I do. Our schools are filled with students, but they have to become preachers before they can be presidents of colleges or editors. (Not necessarily. We have known a number of college presidents, at least, who were laymen.—Editor.) I say let those who feel that they are called to preach never quit until God says, "It is enough, come up higher." (They can and do preach through the press and through the colleges, where they become expounders of the faith to larger audiences than they had before. Who better prepared to instruct the sons of the prophets than the prophets themselves? We presume, as a rule, it is difficult to get laymen that are qualified for such work who are willing to devote themselves to it for the limited salaries usually paid. —Editor.)

We have a new preacher, and I think he is very much liked. But some of the old fogies are not very partial to written sermons. (We don't blame them.—Editor.) My! how we are getting away from the old land-marks. No class-meeting, no lovefeast, no quarterly meeting, only communion on Sunday, if it is a fair day, and written sermons!(And the good sisters talking about voting in the General Conference!—Editor). I think if some of our leaders could be called back they would say, "children, where have you drifted to? Come back to the old paths." The weather has been very severe here this winter. It was very cold. The ground was not clear of snow for over two months, and was covered with heavy sleet for many days.

Mrs. T. E. Weaver.

SPOKANE SPLINTERS.

Dear Methodist:—Since our last writing, winter has been shaking us up considerable, and we imagine the storms in Montana were much more severe. The trains have been blockaded, the mercury reaching 25 degrees below. The snow until recently, about 28 inches deep; but the sunshine and wind of the last few days has caused the snow to disappear very fast. We are all anxious to see the buttercups peeping out, and an "early spring." Our meeting closed the 12th with 10 accessions to the church. Bro. Shelton, of Dayton, accompanied by Master Edward, assisted in the meeting. The afternoon and night services were all well attended, considering the cold weather, and Bro. Shelton's labors among us were appreciated by all. Bro. S. is an able speaker, a gifted evangelist, and no doubt did much good in awakening sinners and luke-warm Christians to their sense of duty, and good will yet be done by his many able appeals to be "true followers of Christ," who will live a life that will, "One day be rewarded."

Sister Oxley, who has been sick for several weeks, we are glad to say, is improving, and her many friends wish her a speedy recovery.

Our church has been made very comfortable (which many will be very glad to hear, who have visited Spokane during cold weather,) by the purchase of a $200. furnace, which was greatly needed and we believe will help to increase our congregations.

Bro. Buker has placed a new clock in the church, for the purpose, we suppose, of aiding those who sometimes happen to be a little late, or whose time may differ somewhat, and who will now start a little earlier that all may begin together. Bro. B. is very thoughtful and he should be thanked for his gift as it is a nice adornment to the wall. (Perhaps it will help the preacher also in curtailing the length of his sermon.—Editor.)

Bro. Craig baptized five persons last Sunday and took four into the church. I believe the church is in better harmony and working order now than it has been since I have first known it, three years ago. We have a good preacher, in sympathy with his people and church, and especially sociable with strangers, and if all will do their duty, this year will be one of much good.

"An Observer."

WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, D. C., Feb. 21, 1893.

Cleveland's Secretary of the Treasury is to be authorized to sell 5-year 3 per cent bonds if necessary to maintain the national credit. It is probable that Carlisle will use the gold reserve before issuing bonds. What is the use of a reserve that is never to be used?

Danger but not necessary danger. There is danger in a full theatre of a fire panic and thousands have been needlessly trodden to death, and there is always the possibility of a monetary scare. But a financial panic in the United States is a silly thing. When timid creditors and foolish public begin to run like scared sheep there is no foretelling how many debtors and business men will be tarmpled under foot. Congress does well to provide a door of escape that can be opened in case fools shout fire.

What is the matter with gold? It has been suggested that European nations were providing it for possible war emergencies. But that is a conjecture which may have a little truth, but is not the real solution. The fact is we are sending gold abroad to pay debts. Look at the 1892 and 1893 exports and imports for January. In 1892, 33 millions exports and 60 millions imports. In 1893, 26 millions exports and 79 millions imports. This means that the country bought last month 57 millions more than it sold abroad and had to pay the balance in gold—a sum about double that paid in 1892. Deacon White says: "If you want to stop gold going abroad, stop importing foreign cigars, French wines, Irish whiskies, Lyons silks, Belgium laces, Belfast linen and English cloths." Certainly if we buy more than we sell the difference must be paid and if paid to Europe it must be paid in gold or in bonds.

Where our surplus goes. The official report of the Commission of Internal Revenue shows that at wholesale rates 1,200 million dollars were spent in this country in 1891 for distilled spirits, wine and beer. The same officers report for that year shows that estimating manufactured tobacco and snuff at 40 cents a pound, cigars at 7 dollars and cigarettes at $1 a hundred, the total expenditure for these articles was over 441 millions of dollars, a sum sufficient to pay all government expenditures for 22 months.

Fourteen governors of states and 40,000 other people are to march up Pennsylvania Avenue with President Cleveland the 4th proximo. Washingtonians hope that we may not have one of our March blizzards such as chilled everybody to the marrow that attended Grant's second inauguration and hastened the death of many people. The naval and military cadets who were kept in line for hours without their overcoats were benumbed and half frozen and when at last they reached their hotel their pitiable condition excited the sympathetic remedial efforrts of the female guests. The officers however would have none of it but brusquely ordered the blue and shivering youngsters to their rooms. Some of the cadets had been prudent enough to put newspapers under their outside clothing. These did not interfere with trimness of figure, and were almost as good as an overcoat.

Crinoline and high winds. People who think of the subject hope that Mrs. Cleveland's very sensible decision not to welcome the return of crinoline willbe imitated by all her sex. Let Europe monopolize the absurd, ugly, inconvenient balloon deformity. If the President's wife can emancipate her country women from the fashionable absurdities of the old world she will deserve a third term.

Capital.

The greatest objection that the planters had to the missionaries coming to the West Indies was that they could make the natives better Christians than their Masters.

The greatest man is he who chooses the right.—Channing.

Everything we do for Christ has something to do with making us like him.

God and Nature are altogether sincere.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Cross-Bearing.

Is the visible Church to-day filled with cross-bearers? How many are taking up crosses daily and joyfully for Jesus' sake? For we greatly err when we interpret the endurance of afflictions as necessarily cross-bearing in the sense of this command of Christ, which is to "take up the cross." Let me explain what I mean. When God takes away our wealth, and the earnings of long years slip in an hour from our grasp, we speak of this enforced poverty as our "cross;" yet it is not, surely, a cross which we have taken up, for we could not help ourselves. God laid it upon our unwilling shoulders. Or if disease shuts you into the sickroom, and shuts out from mind and heart the scenes of busy life, you perhaps look up to those who stand by your bed pitying you, and say, "This I suppose is my cross, and I must bear it patiently" but you have not taken it up. An Omnipotent hand has placed it on your shoulders. And so when death has entered your charmed circle of ove, enters uninvited, and calls a cherished one from your embrace to the safer enfolding of the everlasting arms, we call it a cross; and so it is a cross so heavy that we find it hard to trust in him who has thus wounded and crushed us. But if we were asked to take up such crosses—that is to say, if by our simply willing we could keep the loved ones in the earthly home—I fear we should say, "Not thy will, dear Lord, but mine be done." But taking up the cross is a voluntary endurance of that which is difficult, trying, painful, even a crucifixion of self, if need be, for his sake who, because he so loved us, came into the world to save sinners—a voluntary endurance, so that if we will, we can leave the cross untouched for self's sake or lift it up and carry it for Christ's sake. But cross-bearing is not only the distinct command of the Saviour to each disciple. Not only is the heavenly crown conditioned upon it, but the believer's happiness in this life is in proportion to his experience of the cross. Sacrifice and joy, tears and joy, even agony and joy, are not contradictory terms, but may be synonymous even. The deepest joy springs up in the path of the highest aim, and from the soil of the mightiest passion which strives to attain that aim; and sacrifice only plows up the soil, making the joy purer and grander.

When Dr Mason, one of our missionaries to India, asked his converted boatman whether he was willing to go to Bghais, a neighboring tribe, to tell them of a Saviour's love, he reminded him that, instead of twelve rupees a month, he would receive but four rupees. "Can you go to Bghais for four rupees?" asked the missionary. The heathen convert went by himself and thought and prayed and came back to Dr. Mason. "Well, Chapon, what is your decision?" "My father, I cannot go to Bghais for four rupees a month, but I can go for Jesus." And for Jesus he went. Think you that in all Philippi there were two happier men than Paul and Silas, shouting praises, their feet fast in the stocks and their backs streaming with blood? They were suffering for Jesus and his joy was theirs.

Take up your cross, Christian. Do not pass by it. Do not drag it behind you. Do not wish yours was as light as your neighbor's seems to be. Take it up and rejoice that you can carry it for Jesus. He will walk by your side, putting his shoulder under it and his arms about you, and the heavier the cross the sweeter will be his "Peace be unto you," and thus your joy shall be full.—A. E. Kittredge, D. D., in "Independent."

CHARLES PRATT.

Charles Pratt, the Brooklyn millionaire, educator and philanthropist, began life for himself very poor; had no opportunities for education; went to Boston to become a clerk; concluded that he knew too little for Boston; went to Wilbraham Academy, supporting himself by labor and with the greatest economy; returned to the city in a year rejoicing that he knew a little more than he did before; soon came to New York; was an employee for a number of years; formed a partnership in the oil business; when the Standard Oil Company was formed entered it worth about $100,000. Though this was less than twenty years ago, during that period his net gains have averaged nearly $1,000,000 per annum—not wholly, but principally, from that corporation.

The Pratt Institute, an institution for the training of young men in the trades and young women, was founded by him, and at the time of his death two thousand persons were receiving its advadtages. It is one of the most successful enterprises of the kind in the world.

Mr. Pratt was an intense friend of Missions, and interested in charitable work, though preferring to aid men to help themselves rather than to assist them outright.

Those persons who believe it is impossible to be rich and religious in the Biblo sense will, of course, rule out Mr. Pratt at once, as they would be compelled to exclude Abraham, Job, and Joseph of Arimathea. But those who knew this man best will say that in his death Caristianity has lost a firm friend, the Baptist church a devoted member, education an intelligent patron; the needy and suffering classes a discriminating philanthropist, the country a patriot, Brooklyn one of its most public spirited citizens. At the Adelphi Academy one of the trustees read a part of a letter from Mr. Pratt containing these words: "I feel that life is so short that I am not satisfied unless I do each day the best I can." His last act was signing a check for $5,000 to aid the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities.

PRIVATE DEVOTION.

A devotional spirit performing devotional acts is the perfection of the private Christian life. Religious devotion includes solemn consecration to Almighty God, an earnest engagedness of affection to him, a profound reverence and delight in meditation and prayer, and reading God's holy word.

Without devotion there can be no acceptable approach to God, and we fear many of the private duties of professed Christians are performed without this essential characteristic. Many scarcely know what it is to be shut up with God—the soul prostrate in adoration, and penetrated and overborne with a solemn sense of the majestic presence, with every thought and desire and affection consecrated, hungering and thirsting and struggling for greater conformity to the divine will, wrapt in holy meditation and breathing ardent prayer. This is devotion. Such soul exercises in secret evidence true spiritual life, and, at the same time, abundantly sustains it. This is wrestling with God, and those who thus wrestle, as princes, have power with God and prevail.

The spirit of true devotion always recognizes the divine glory. Without this recognition our private duties, if performed at all, are performed selfishly. They are performed entirely on the utilitarian principle, solely in view of the personal benefit to be derived therefrom, excluding all idea that the divine honor and glory are involved, that God has any interest at all in the performance. The ruling questions are, "Who is the Almighty that we should serve him? and what profit should we have if we pray unto him?" Acting on this principle, if our duties do not promise personal benefit immediately, we excuse ourselves with a hasty performance of them, and close the book; or rise from our knees and go our way into the world.

Now this is a very imperfect view of our duty. It has not only a human side, but a divine side; human interests are not only involved, but the divine honor also. And if we tarry not for our own benefit and pleasure, we should bow in silent waiting, and do reverence to the divine majesty. In a spiritual sense we are priests before God as well as penitents, and when we thus approach, we offer sacrifice as well as supplication. The Psalmist has said, "Whoso offereth praise, glorifieth me."

We should read devotionally, not only with a devotional spirit, but the books should be devotional books. The Bible first, especially the Psalms for contrition and confession, and some portions of the prophecies and Epistles for sublime conceptions of the divine character. In addition to the Word of God, other devotional books should be read as a part of our religious exercises. The Protestant Church does not abound in this class of literature and we seem to be afraid of what we have, as mystical or fanatical. Many of our most spiritual biographies are neglected from this cause. Many passages in these books are the pure utterances of a consecrated spirit in the ear of God, and for God alone, and this language of others is often better adapted to the closet, and is more expressive of our own hearts' emotions, and brings us near to God than any we could frame ourselves. Devotional poetry, too, is a great help to the spirit of devotion. Poetry is the language of the affections, and its use kindles them into a glow of praise. Our own hymn book is unequaled for this purpose.—Rev. Dr. D. D. Lore.

HOW TO BUILD A FIRE.

Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D., writing in his characteristically impressive vein in a recent "Evangelist," upon "How to Work for Souls," says:

"The severest trial of faith in all Christian labor is to toil a great while with little or no result. 'Rather slow work this,' I said to Mr. Moody, twenty years ago, when he had started a little prayer-meeting in our chapel. 'So it is,' he replied; 'but if you want to kindle a fire, you must put together a few splinters, blow them into a blaze, and then you may pile on the wood afterwards.' His plan succeeded; for after a half dozen persons had become warmed by the Holy Spirit, the flame spread among all the teachers, and there was a glorious ingathering of converts. A warm-hearted lawyer in my church determined to work for the conversion of an infidel in the congregation. After a while the sceptic said to him, 'Mr. J—, you had better give me up as a hard case, and try somebody else.' But Mr. J— did not give him up until he saw him safely landed in the church; the lawyer is now in heaven, and his convert is a Christian worker out in Colorado. Unless Ruth had been content to pick up one spear at a time, she never would have got her bag of barley."

—o—

There are said to be extant not less than 400,000 Christian hymns. Germany heads the list with 100,000. The most prolific writer of hymns was Charles Wesley, who wrote 6,500. Next to him came James Edmeston, who wrote 2,000. Isaac Watts, whose hymns are among the most popular, wrote about 400. Only about one in ten of the hymns written is worthy to be pronounced "classical and immortal." Fanny Crosby, the most prolific of living hymn writers, has produced about 2,000 hymns and religious songs.

We do not have to be great in anything except faith to obtain great favor with God.

LET WELL ENOUGH ALONE.

There are many people who seem not to know when they have a good thing. They are forever wanting to try something new—to give up that which has been tried and found good for that of which they know but little. Neither are they disposed to profit by the experience of other people. They will rush blindly forward in pursuit of their pet theory, regardless of the warnings and entreaties of those who have tested them fully and found them sadly defective.

For many decades the people called Methodists had no musical instruments in their chapels to assist them in their worship. They needed none. They had a religion that filled their souls with life and love and melody, and their mouths with joyful songs that stirred and captivated and thrilled the world's heart and that are vibrating all around the globe today. But since they have become rich and great in the world, there is a clamor for quoirs and organs, and stringed instruments, because they please and draw, and they are brought into our churches, just when many others are giving them up and returning to the primitive custom of congregational singing.

Some are also tired of bishops and long to dispense with them as an expensive luxury, while many of the thoughtful men of other churches, seeing so many workmen standing idle "because no man hath hired them," and so many churches vacant at the same time, have confessed the need of something in their economy that would serve the purpose of our episcopacy in supplying their churches and giving employment to their ministry.

Of late we have heard not a little about the propriety of removing the time limit from the pastorate, which would be virtually the adoption of a settled ministry. They talk glibly of the absurdity of letting the almanac regulate the pastorate, as though it were any more absurd than letting it regulate the time for holding our quarterly, annual, or general conferences. Upon this subject, the "Christian Observer," the leading Presbyterian paper of the South, which is supposed to know something of what it writes, has this to say:

"Our church ought to provide for a regular change of pastors. Unless a man has very superior gifts he cannot serve one church with acceptance and success for a great number of years. Since in our church there is no plan or regular changes, and since to vote against a pastor is always construed by him as an act of personal hostility, the congregations of the Presbyterian Church have adopted the plan of freezing out the pastor when they think the time has come for a change. They quit paying and quit attending the church, and in due time he takes the hint and resigns. Unfortunately, however, the church is often times nearly frozen to death by this procedure. This is the present plan, and every reader of these lines will recognize at once the truth of this statement. Another evil of the life pastorate is, that a few rich churches monopolize the talent of our strong preachers. Men like Dr. Palmer and Dr. Hoge have their light hid under a bushel. Nobody ever gets to hear them preach, and their circle of influence is localized and restricted. The eagle needs to stir up her nest. Our strong preachers ought to be pulled out of their warm places and turned loose on the church. It has pleased God to save the world by the foolishness of preaching, and no talented man should sit down in one place for a life-time."

The above are wise and strong words, and the source from which they come gives them additional force. Doubtless they are born out of a bitter experience, and our people will do well to heed them, and be content to let well enough alone.

Brother Squires, in his report, notes that at the second quarterly meeting for East Helena charge, the salary of the presiding elder was paid in full to that time, and gives the credit thereof to the preacher in charge. We rejoice to hear of such thoughtful attention on the part of the preacher in a place where there is no regular Board of Stewards, and really no one else to attend such duties. The presiding elder needs every dollar that is due him. But we wonder if the same could be said of the salary of the preacher in charge. We trust so, for as a rule, he needs his "prorata" about as much as the next man. One good turn deserves another. In the absence of well organized Boards of Stewards, and sometimes of any, as is not unfrequently the case in new charges in the Northwest, the pastor is often dependent in a large measure upon the personal efforts of the presiding elder in stirring up the pure minds of the people concerning their duty in this direction. Not unfrequently this official has been known to "lift" a collection in the congregation and to canvass in the community for subscriptions and contributions to this cause. These are some of the "temporal interests" that the sub-superintendent is to look after, and they are by no means the least important. If neglected by him, the preacher in many instances, goes unpaid and is crippled in his work. Preachers have the name of being good collectors, but as a rule they are too modest to collect money for themselves. Western presiding elders have ample opportunity for the exercise of this grace. May they not neglect the gift that is in them this year. The laborer is worthy of his hire. We trust that those interested will see to it that the wants of our worthy Western workers are well supplied.

The inauguration ceremonies at Washington on the 4th of March, are said to have surpassed anything of the kind ever witnessed before in the history of our country. Hundreds of people paid from fifty cents to five dollars for a seat in the open air and in the storm, where they could watch the procession pass. The blinding snow made it very disagreeable. Better have the ceremonies in Montana next time, as we had excellent weather on inauguration day this year. The presidential term ought to be six or eight years, so that these exciting times, which are very expensive to our people, would not come so often.

The Montana legislature did not elect a senator, and the governor has appointed Hon. Lee Mantle, a Republican, of Butte, and a friend of Mr. Daly, to that position.

Congress did not pass the Anti-Option bill, nor did it reconsider its action on the Sunday closing of the World's Fair.

The appointment of Judge H. E. Jackson, a Democrat, of Tennessee, to the Supreme Bench, by President Harrison, and the selection of Walter I. Gresham, a Republican, for Secretary of State by President Cleveland have been severely criticised by the politicians. We know not the motives that prompted these acts, but we hail with joy any indication of a disregard for party lines in the selection of pure, honest, competent men for positions of trust.

The people of our country will have time to carefully consider the question of Hawaiian annexation.

Please remit the amount now due on your subscription to the "Montana Methodist."

Rev. G. J. Warren, of Carrollton, Mo., sends his renewal to the "Methodist," and love and earnest prayers for "all the brethren of the Montana Conference." "George" is one of the solid men of the old Missouri Conference. May his bow abide in strength.

Brother W. R. Smotherman, a worthy layman at Rockford, Wash., renews his subscription and adds: The "Methodist" is a welcome visitor and comes regularly. Will try to send you some new names. Long live the "Methodist."

We trust that our brother will succeed in his efforts to send us some new names. We heartily appreciate the interest that our brethren over there are taking in the paper. Let their example provoke others to good works of the same sort.

The meeting at Corvallis has been in progress one week, with increased attendance and growing interest. There have been four conversions and three accessions to the church. The outlook is fine for a splendid meeting. Rev. Alton is a strong and impressive preacher, somewhat after the Sam Jones order, and has delivered some sledge hammer blows against sin. He went to Butte on Saturday, expecting to return the next week. Rev. J. R. Wagener preached one of the finest sermons on Sunday morning that we have listened to for many a day. His subject was "Christ Mighty to Save." The scope was broad, the reasoning logical and irresistible. It was rich in imagery and impassioned in delivery. It had the old-time Methodist ring, and made a profound impression upon the audience which was held spellbound for nearly an hour.

We praise the Lord for what he is doing and trust that still greater things are in store for us.

Brother Haggard's handshake will bring a thrill of joy to many readers of the "Methodist." None knew him but to love him during his stay in the Northwest. We would love to be a guest at Lebanon next fall, and we hope to see a man of Haggard face (in name only) amid the Rockies again. His countenance contradicts his cognomen. We hope to hear from him again.

Brother Warren has been holding a fine meeting at Cottonwood, in which he was assisted by Brothers Tabor and McLaughlin. At last reports there had been a number of conversions and accessions to the church.

The licensing of two young men to preach, Brothers Glasgow and McLaughlin, at the recent quarterly conferences of Bozeman station and Bozeman circuit, respectively, is an event that should cause the heart of every Methodist in Montana to thrill with joy. The first time that we ever saw Dr. D. C. Kelley—when he was missionary treasurer—while discussing the demands of the western work, he remarked very positively, "Before you can hope to succeed largely in the west you will have to SPROUT your men." It impressed us greatly. Thank the Lord, the "sprouts" are coming up. We trust that they will prove to be trees of the Lord's planting and become "plants of renown" in the Master's vineyard. Brother Glasgow is laboring in Deer Lodge valley under the direction of Brother Britt; and Brother McLaughlin is assisting Brother Warren on Bozeman circuit.

Many hearts will be made sad by the announcement that Brother J. B. Parnall has been compelled to resign his charge and give up all active work, and that Sister Parnall also is in poor health again. To a man of Brother Parnall's active mind and consuming zeal for God's cause, this must be a great affliction. But we rejoice that he and his noble wife have the faith and fortitude to bear it and the grace to be "exercised thereby." They went to the coast in the hope of being able to continue in their loved employ, and were greatly elated at Conference at Albany in the prospect of realizing their hopes. We rejoice that they are in the midst of loving friends. Our people in Montana will pray earnestly for sustaining and comforting grace to be granted them in their affliction, and for their restoration to health.

Brother L. Bramble has made a visit to his old home in Ohio and Virginia and returned and is hard at work again in his field before we were hardly aware that he had gone. Doubtless his visit will prove profitable in many ways. The present writer felt better satisfied to remain and work in Montana after his first visit to the old home.

We take pleasure in announcing that the amount apportioned to Montana as her share of the Missionary debt to raise has been paid over to the treasurer, with one dollar over, an "more to follow." We are convinced that the debt will be paid soon. But we doubt not that the regular collections have been interfered with in doing it. The class of the fiscal year is at hand March 31st, and we learn that nothing like the amount due at this time, has been paid in. According to a rule adopted by the Board, to keep the appropriation within the regular collections of the previous year, we fear there will have to be further retrenchment. It would pain us most deeply to see a dollar taken from our appropriation to the Western field. We ought rather to enlarge next year. Let us give attention now to raising the regular missionary collection.

Brother J. S. Randolph, of Farmington, Wash., March 3. We are having one of the longest winters ever had here. Yesterday morning at my house it was ten above, with plenty of snow, though it thaws a little every day. Snow is eighteen inches deep on the prairie, and two and a half feet on the hills.

Brother Compton is holding a protracted meeting at Palouse, and having some success. He has had Brothers Swift, Hornbuckle, and Skee, to help him, one at a time. Times are very hard here. Those who held their wheat missed it, as it is not as high as last fall.

The Northern Pacific is one of the best lines of railroad that it has ever been our lot to travel upon in the West, or Northwest, or anywhere else, for that matter. Its road-bed is kept in good repair, its immense trains are equipped with everything that can minister to the comfort of the passenger, its officers, from the general manager and passenger agent at St. Paul, down to the humblest brakeman or dining car waiter, are competent, honest and obliging. Several times we have, by some oversight, left articles in the depot or on board the train, and strange to say, in every case they have been forwarded to us--from a grip down to a memorandum book. This speaks well for the railroad boys in the "wild and woolly West."

Harbor Lights.

Keep looking to the end. Live in the spirit of Paul's great words: "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God."

Oh! to come in with banners untarnished and meet the victor's welcome at the gates. How is it all going to end? How is it going to look in that day? Keep your glance ahead.

Beloved, live for the eternal years. Lay up all your treasures yonder. Steer for the harbor lights. Never mind the rough way if you only reach safe home. Never mind the trials now, stand firm; keep guard; watch always; some day you shall take a long breath and say, as you sink back into His everlasting arms, "Thank God it is all over, and it is all safe." Then you shall not be sorry for a sacrifice or tear, a self-denial or a victorious stand.

Dutiful Children.

The sacred Literature of China gives "Twenty-four Patterns of Filial Piety," selected from lives of eminent persons. We copy a few of these "patterns," which may interest our young friends, and help them to understand why it is the Chinese excel all nations in reverence for their parents and ancestors:

Wen Ti. Son of the founder of the Han dynasty. During his youth his mother was sick three years, during which time he never left her apartment, nor changed his clothing.

Tsen Shen. A disciple of Confucius and author of "Great Learning." When a boy he was away from home so far that he could not hear his mother's call. At length she bit her finger, and he, feeling a sympathetic twinge, hurried home.

Ts'ai Shun. During a famine he nourished his mother with wild berries, giving her the ripe ones and living on the unripe ones himself. When mourning by her coffin he was told that the house was on fire; but he refused to move and the house remained unharmed. Because his mother feared thunder, he sat by her grave whenever there was a storm, saying, "Fear not, Mother, I am here."—Missionary Link.

A Zenana missionary, in describing a journey in northern districts of India, where no lady had been before with the Gospel message, says: "Over and over again the women said how glad they were to have a Mem to speak to them; that the Sahib came to talk to the men, but, of course, they could not go to listen to him, and now they had a Mem all to themselves! As the news spread through the villages round, messages were sent to us, begging us to go to them. Riding through one village, the women came out and called to me as I passed, Are you not going to stop? Are we not to hear? Here are heathen women ready to be taught, longing for more light, and there is no one to go to them. There are many villages, very many, all through this district, where no lady has ever been. 'A thousand missionaries!' If only the Church were awake to her responsibility, ten thousand would be thought little to ask for."—Missionary Link.

For a long time the Moravian missionaries in Greenland could find no word in the language of the Esquimaux that they could use for Savior in their translation of the Bible. But one day some men were out in a terrible storm and were rescued in their time of need by one of their neighbors. When they were telling the story of their wonderful escape, one of the missionaries asked, "What would you call the friend who saved you?" They replied with a word that gave the missionaries the expression for which they had been searching, and since that time it has been used among the esquimaux to designate the Saviour of mankind.

In Uganda a man will willingly work three months for a copy of the New Testament in his own language.

At the beginning of this century the Bible was accessible to but one-fifth of the population of the world. Now it has been translated into so many languages that it may be read by nine-tenths of the people of the globe.

One-third of the people inhabiting the Congo basin are cannibals. The Bangola believe that the bravery and other qualities of a victim are imparted to those who eat his flesh.

REVIEW.

RECAPITULATION.

Six different books of the Old Testament have furnished the lessons of this quarter. In the main they have had historic connection, and it has been with no violence to their innermost sentiment that they have been grouped under the general topic, Grace Triumphant Over Sin; and they are all illustrative of that New Testament sentiment chosen as a golden text for the quarter, namely, "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." (Rom. v. 20.)

As a whole, the lessons were set forth in the Pre-view thus:

GRACE TRIUMPHANT OVER SIN.

1. The Captive Exiles Released.
2. The Ruined Temple Rebuilt.
3. The Broken Confidence Restored.
4. The Vacated Priesthood Reoccupied.
5. The Source of Power Reopened.
6. The Divine Service Recommenced.
7. Efforts at Restoration Renewed.
8. The Fallen Defenses Replaced.
9. The Neglected Law again in Honor.
10. The Dishonored Sabbath Reobserved.
11. Faith Victorious Over Despair.
12. Good Victorius Over Evil.

LESSON 1.—God touches the heart of Cyrus, and we see "The Captive Exiles Released." And it is done in the most helpful manner; for the lesson illustrates (1) Release decreed, (2) Release accepted, and (3) Favors bestowed, by which favors the returning exiles were enriched, and all about were made to honor them. How this illustrates the topic and the golden text for the quarter is obvious.

LESSON 2.—Replaced in Jerusalem, the sacred temple first claimed attention, and efforts met with marked success. To see "The Ruined Temple Rebuilt" was their high ambition, and to that end they addressed themselves. (1) Ceremonial preparations are made; then (2) Business-preparations; and then (3) Rebuilding was vigorously commenced. This new beginning again illustrated the quarterly topic and text.

LESSON 3.—Those who had seen the glory of the former temple were much dejected by the beginnings of this, and their lamentations were contagious. True, the younger people thought this new start an occasion for joy, but their songs of gladness were no match for the wails of sadness which rose from the ancient people. It was needful, therefore, that they should have "The Broken Confidence Restored." To this gracious end we see in this lesson (1) Toilers remembered; (2) Exhortation uttered; and (3) Promises made. By these means the prophet Haggai reawakened courage and secured success.

LESSON 4.—The priesthood had suffered with all other means of prosperity. The office had practically been vacated. They needed to have "The Vacated Priesthood Reoccupied." In this vision of Zechariah the case was exactly met; for he sees (1) The priesthood in dishonor; (2) The priesthood in honor; grace having once again triumphed over sin; and then, that its work may for the future be done with unquestionable correctness, we see (3) The priesthood instructed. So far in the lessons solid foundations for prosperity are laid; and still the good work goes farther.

LESSON 5.—But with so many adjustments made, Israel might lean on an arm of flesh, or on instruments alone. To guard this, in an other vision of Zechariah we find "The Source of Power Reopened." There was (1) The vision; then was unfolded, (2) The lesson; and then, lest any error might occur, (3) The application. Thus skillfully did grace circumvent and triumph over evil.

LESSON 6—With all these preparations completed, one would naturally look to see "The Divine Service Recommenced." As a first step in this direction, we find (1) The temple rededicated. Then, that its services may proceed in proper order, and without interruption, we find (2) The priesthood reorganized; then, as a timely and helpful act, we see (3) The Passover reobserved. Thus the channel was opened for further and fuller displays of grace.

LESSON 7.—But much yet remained to make up the longed-for prosperity. The temple had been completed, but the city lay as an open waste, its former walls a mass of rubbish. But grace was still operative, and we see "Efforts at Restoration Renewed." To Nehemiah, in his distant, royal home, news of Zion's desolations was carried, and (1) Desolations bemoanod, by that noble Israelite, is the picture presented. But lamentation is not all with him. He acts, and (2) Restoration besought, by Nehemiah, through the Lord's help, and at the king's hands is the next view. Still the movement is toward the triumphs of grace over iniquity.

LESSON 8.—Work on the fallen defenses began, but it was seriously opposed. Yet the people were zealous and brave, and the work went on until they saw "The Fallen Defenses Replaced." This lesson displays (1) Discouraging surroundings, for these did exist. But it also shows (2) Wise action, under which, by God's blessing, there comes (3) Satisfactory progress, again confirming the quarter's text.

LESSON 9.—With the advantages now in possession, a straight way to prosperity seemed clear. It is entered heartily, and by unanimous action we see "The Neglected Law Restored to Honor." The first step of this restoration was (1) the law read; then (2) The law honored, from which came precious fruit; namely, (3) The people comforted. Thus grace sweetly blessed the once afflicted people.

LESSON 10.—But those on the right path do not stop with one reform. Others were needed in Israel, and under Nehemiah's effective measures we find "The Dishonored Sabbath Reobserved," and well observed. Two sketches stand here in contrast: (1) The Sabbath profaned, and (2) The Sabbath honored; this last result being another victory for grace.

LESSON 11.—Not all of Israel, however, enjoyed these better days at Jerusalem. Some were still in exile, and yet God's favoring grace was upon them, and with these we find "Faith Victorious over Despair." There was for Esther and her people (1) A desperate situation; but, so far as they saw, there was (2) A possible opportunity, though that possibility seemed a slender one. But there came that invincible element, (3) An act of faith, and that, by the grace of God, brought (4) A victorious outcome, and Israel was saved.

LESSON 12.—A variety of illustrations of "Good Victorious over Evil" appear in this lesson, in these well-known instances; namely (1) Wisdom; (2) Contentment; (3) Temperance; (4) Teachableness. He who uses any or all of these good measures is the victor over evil, and to the grace of God all praise belongs.—S. S. Times.

How to Be Healthy.

Be cheerful. "A light heart lives long."

Don't worry. "Seek peace and pursue it."

Never despair. "Lost hope is a fatal disease."

"Work like a man, but don't be worked to death."

Don't hurry. "Too swift arrives as tardy as too slow."

Sleep and rest abundantly. Sleep is nature's benediction.

Avoid passion and excitement. A moment's anger may be fatal.

Associate with healthy people. Health is contagious as well as disease.

Court the fresh air day and night.

"Oh, if you knew what was in the air!"

Don't overeat. Don't starve. "Let your moderation be known to all men."

Think only healthful thoughts. "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he."

——o——

If we love God supremely we will love our neighbor as ourselves.

"The heart with love to God inspired with love to man will glow."

The Ministry of Pain.

Pain, as to God's own children, is, truly and really, only blessing in disguise. It is but his chiseling, one of his graving tools producing the likeness to Jesus for which we long. I never yet came across a suffering Christian (real) who could not thank him for the pain. Is not this a strong and comforting fact? I do not say that they always do so during the very moments of keenest pain, though much more often than not I think they are able to do this; but certainly they do deliberately praise him for it afterward. I think one must pass through it for one's self before one can fully realize the actual blessedness of suffering. Meanwhile you may well take the testimony of those who have. Its conscious effects are to give one deeper feeling of one's entire weakness and helplessness—a lesson which we are all slow to learn in health—and of the real nothingness of earthly aims and comforts and the fleetingness and unsatisfactoriness of every thing except Christ. Then it drives one to him each moment—one cannot bear it even one minute alone, one must lean and cling; and any thing is blessed which does this. Then one finds that he is tender and gracious, that his promises are indeed precious, and that his presence is a reality, even if unrealized. Then one has opportunities which one could not otherwise have of learning trust and patience and meekness. It is a time of growing up into him in these things. Then one realizes what it must have been to Jesus to endure real, actual bodily pain for us. I never saw such tremendous force in 1 Peter ii. 24, ("in his own body,") as when suffering great pain myself. It seemed a new page of his love unfolded to me. So far, the whole question of pain is rather one of sight than of faith to me now. It has become so clear to me as a part of God's great plan which could not be done without. But I find yet scope for faith beyond. I believe there is a mysterious connection between suffering here and actual capabilities of enjoyment hereafter, and that suffering here is training, I cannot tell how, for that glorious service above to which I delight to look forward. But now, look for yourself at what God's Word says about it, and dwell on that instead of on your own thoughts about it, for his thoughts are not as your thoughts. Look at 2 Cor. iv. 17-18, and then see how much more you can find in his Word which bears on the subject. When a trial is past, one does so bitterly regret not having trusted him entirely in it; as one sees that we might as well have had all the joy and rest of perfect trust all along.—Memorials of F. R. H.

CHURCH NEWS.

FIELD NOTES.

Dear "Methodist:"—I had expected to see my notes in the present copy, concerning the District Conference, and we will be together in session perhaps by the time these come out. I hope all the brethren will be present who can possibly come; as we desire to have the largest possible good accrue to us all from the coming together.

I must now report some things concerning the work of general interest to all the workers. And first of all the men are all well and at work, at their respective posts of duty.

As you know brother Flowers has not yet returned from the south. Bro. Bramble has returned from his visit much refreshed, and encouraged to put in and do more and better work than ever before.

He will soon be in his nice new parsonage at East Helena, the building of which was made possible by the grant of the Conference Church Ex. Board. I must note that at E. Helena the claim for P. E. was up in full for the 2nd quarter, also a rare virtue in these ends of the field. So you may see now why I ask Bro. Bramble to write a paper for the District Conference, "preparing for the quarterly meeting."

The exceedingly cold weather had possession when my appointment came for Helena, and the P. C. thought we would not be able to have service at all perhaps, and certainly not at evening; but we brooked the storm, as did some old and quite decrepit ones, and had a pleasant service at Bethhoms, with small attendance.

The Q. M. at Bozeman was of special interest, the presence of Father Stateler at the services, and the licensing of Robt. L. Glasgow to preach, helped to make it so, beside the pleasant meeting and communion with a good congregation. Bro. Tabor is collecting funds for new seats for the church—"opera chairs"-making Bozeman charge what it justly should be, one of the best and most desirable charges in the Conference.

A week spent in the meetings at Cottonwood, a point on Bro. Warren's circuit, was very helpful to me, and I trust was mutually so. About five (5) souls had professed to be converted when I left, and several had applied for membership, and "more to follow." Bros. Tabor and McLaughlin were helping Bro. Warren in the meetings, and it continues indefinitely. Bro. Warren's "Q. M." was of unusual interest on account of the licensing of Bro. McLaughlin to preach—a young man of Scotch descent, converted in the Salvation Army and a promising brother.

The people had given Bro. Warren a whole deer and as I came back through Bozeman the friends "pounded" Bro. Tabor, about $25.00 worth, so you see the laborer gets his hire in some way or other.

At Townsend the announcement was made for Saturday night preaching, and a good congregation met us Sunday morning, large communion service, and two valuable accessions to the church; and Sunday night a large and intelligent and appreciative audience, to which, after preaching, I talked about carpeting the house, building the parsonage for the preacher, &c.

The material is on the ground to build this parsonage and will be used when spring opens so men can work.

Bro. Lee has passed through deep affliction, but has maintained himself in his integrity before the Lord and before the community, and the work has developed well under his hand. The quarterly conference was held in the office of Mr. Baldwin, an attorney, who has lately united with the church and promises great usefulness in the work of the Lord in that community. As the seven (7) of us gathered together in the business session and dedicated this office to the use of the church, I could but think of the 1st Q. M. of the year at that charge, when only two men were present except P. C. and P. E. The finances are not full here; but like the other points named the people had made some special effort to relieve Bro. Lee-a purse had been made up for him and presented to him at an afternoon appointment, Sunday.

I trust the brethren will all pay the amounts subscribed for the "Missionary Debt" as soon as possible; we want to remain at the head of the class—always had a passion for that very thing."

FROM EAST HELENA.

Dear Brother Stanley:—Since I wrote you last, I have been East, on a visit. I was in Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia and Missouri; met with many of my old friends and acquaintances, and had a very pleasant time. I returned to my work last week; feeling that I had been profited and strengthened by my visit and better prepared for the labors of the remainder of the year. The work on our parsonage has been checked some on account of cold weather; but is moving off briskly now, and we hope to be in the house by first of April. Brother Chalfan has taken charge as superintendent of our Sunday School, and we find him the right man for the place, and the School is doing well. We had good interest and refreshing time, both in our morning and evening services, last Sunday.

I am pleased with the weekly visits of the "Methodist". Bro. Bell's proposition is a good one. I will evidence my approval by ordering two papers for one year. I am expecting Mrs. Bramble home next week.

FROM BROTHER PARNALL.

Coquille, Coos Co., Ore.
Feb. 22nd, 1893.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—You will, I know, be sorry to learn that on account of the broken down condition of my health I have this day been constrained to send to my presiding elder, Rev. H. S. Shangle, my resignation of the pastorate of this charge.

My health improved quite a good deal during November and December last, and we were hopeful of a substantial recovery, but a little extra work in connection with our quarterly meeting services in January, followed by an attack of "La Grippe," has so completely prostrated me, that I have not attempted to preach for four Sundays past, neither do I expect to try again, whatever my condition may apparently be, for many months, perhaps even the entire plan of my life, as I had maped it out, will have to be changed. I am able to be up and around, but feel quite weak and played out after any little exertion.

Mrs. Parnall also is again in very poor health, under the doctor's care.

All this is very disappointing to us of course, yet we do not feel like murmuring, or even regretting anything we have done in the past. We fully believe that having acknowledged the Lord in all our ways," He has according to His promise "directed our paths."

As we are very pleasantly and healthily situated here, we shall continue to reside at this place for the present, removing perhaps to Bandon on the coast when the finer weather comes. If climatic influences will benefit us, we could not have found a more suitable part of the country than this, I believe. And likewise of kindness and sympathy on the part of friends around, will assist in our recovery, as they always do, we could not have been more richly blessed even in dear old Bitter Root. Hence, you see we have many things to be thankful for.

Asking the prayers of the Lord's people for our speedy recovery if it be God's will as well as for our future guidance, and with our Christian love to yourself and family and all our dear friends in Montana,

I remain, Yours Fraternally,
J. B. Parnall.

FROM ROSALIA, WASH.. MARCH 3, 1893.

Bro. Swift held our second quarterly Conference for Oakesdale circuit, at Oakesdale, Wash., last Saturday and Sunday, Feb. 25th and 26th. The reports were not as good as we had desired, and yet they showed faithful efforts and some advance. Eight members had been received, 4 baptized, $92.50 was raised for the support of the ministry, and about the same amount paid on the parsonage. Our subscription ($20.00) for the Missionary Debt were paid. Bro. W. H. Carder has increased the Aurora church subscription to $720.00. We hope to build this year. We had some precious seasons of grace during our meetings at Pine City, Enterprise and Thorn Creek, although small visible results. Mr. Hosea S. Edwards and Miss Maud M. Bussard were united in Holy matrimony, at the home of the bride's mother in Spokane Co., Wash., March 1st, '93. Enclosed find one dollar. Send the "Montana Methodist" to Miss Anna Williams, Rosalia. —Howson B. Terry.

LET US HAVE REVIVALS.

We see appointments made by Bishop Galloway to meet ten district conferences in Missouri. To the ear of a far out northwestern itinerant this sounds like the bugle notes of the chief pastorate calling together the subs., and their lay assistants for council, and for a more determined, aggressive movement upon the enemy's lines. It makes the slumbering revival fires start up in his bones. But after all, there is so much business to be done at these meetings, and the preachers are so engrossed in its transaction, that a revival is not thought to be practical. This looks, to some of us that are too ardent to be good optimists, like increasing the machinery at the expense of the motor power, or like "leading the horse down with harness." Would not an old fashioned revival be worth more to the preachers and to the district than all the business that they do, however well it may be done? But then, the business can be done and the revival had too, if the latter is made prominent. That is, if there is religion enough when put together to stir others to seek it. It seems to us that the optimistic idea has so overloaded the church with blessings that her spiritual forces are largely employed along this line of her operation, and if this policy continues, exhaustion is inevitable.

The spiritual life of the church is in the number and extent of her revivals. And any thing that stops these special seasons of grace renders her less efficient in her work of saving souls. Her business should only be that of doing such things as conduce to this end; or her business should be a means to this end, and not itself become an end, as is the tendency when it becomes permanent in her religious gatherings. When her ministers come together to consider her interests, their zeal for the salvation of souls should impregnate the air with a revival spirit. We are seriously impressed that, if need be, less business in all of our church gatherings and more religion will better meet the needs of our day and generation. Cannot our chief pastors and connectional officers visit our district, and, when practical, our quarterly conferences, and make them revival occasions? It seems to us to be a stinging reproach to our itinerant system to allow its revival fires to be quenched by its increased business engagements.

A BROTHERLY GREETING.

Lebanon, Tenn., Feb. 25, '93.

Editor "Montana Methodist:

—Through you I desire to shake hands with the Southern Methodism of the Northwest, and particularly that portion which I am acquainted with—Walla Walla, Pendleton, Weston, Dayton, Spokane Falls, Hepner, and others. To you my mind is turning ever. I often think of the good times we had in conferences and revivals. That conference at Spokane is still a feast of fatness to my soul. The acquaintances and friendships formed there between preachers and people are eternal. While I longed to see the familiar faces of loved ones at home, and the hills and valleys of beautiful Tennessee, still it gave me no little pain to cut loose from the most heroic band of men I ever saw. It is a pleasure and honor to have your faith linked and your name enrolled with such men. How anxiously we watch every mail for the little "Montana Methodist," and then how closely we scan every line if perchance we may see or hear something from the "field hands." How sad when we read of the death of old father Howard and his good wife. A good, and brave, and faithful man gone to his reward. I never knew Sister H., but she must have been a true, good and great woman to have given to the church the rich legacy in the person of the brave and able minister of Christ, Bro. M. V. Howard. One by one our fathers are falling, or retiring from the effective list. But how inspiring to us, their sons, to hear them as they send back the shouts of triumph from the last conflict as they stand in the twilight of two worlds. You have received some good recruits since we were there. Every young man should be out West for a while to get a true idea of what a "pioneer preacher" means. He needs to hear Larken or Skee before the Board of Church Extension asking for help to build churches—where lots have been given on condition that you build by a certain time or it will be given to some one who will. I would love to see the beautiful little church at Dayton. And meet my friend Gibbs, and the old sailor preacher, Chamberlain, and Hanger; but I can't name them all—everybody. I know Bro. Michaels, and every foot of ground he has to go over in Walla Walla. I must make mention of that prince of laymen, D. M. Jesse, and his wife—she was the more princely of the two. I can say that, as it is all in the family. This is my second year here at Lebanon. This is the seat of Cumberland Presbyterianism—their Theological and Law Departments are here. This is a time honored institution. It is represented in all the departments of the government, except the cabinet. I have a pleasant charge to serve. Have 286 members. The Tennessee Conference meets with us next fall. Mr. Editor, come. Rev. B. Fay Mills is just closing one of his successful meetings in Nashville. His great success lies in his superior generalship. He manages well. It is a great thing to be a great preacher. But every true preacher is a great man. The greatest thing any man can do is to turn men to Christ to-day. In this busy, progressive age, when men are overwhelmed with worldly enterprises, and swept down by a desire to get gain, and when there are so many forms and phases of unbelief, to turn a man to Christ is greater than "raising the dead." But I must stop, or my first will be too long.

I have just gotten up out of a very severe attack of the grippe. It is a great "vise," and when once a man is in it he remains until it releases its "grippe" on him. Love to all who may think of us. Success to the "Montana Methodist," and Southern Methodism in that part of the earth.

In Christian love,
W. T. Haggard.

FROM THE LAND OF FLOWERS.

To the "Methodist:"—How strange it seems to one in your far northern homes, to read letters which tell you that in parts of our grand country and Union, the thermometer registers as high as eighty degrees above zero; that flowers are blooming; and that vegetables of almost any variety may be found in the markets. Yet this is true. In Florida we find this state of affairs. We are enjoying delightful weather, doubtless the most delightful of all the year.

The thermometer has reached eighty degrees above zero this month, but probably has stood near seventy most of the time. We need no fires in our sitting rooms, nor do we need fans, as yet. It is very pleasant indeed without fire or fan. This cannot be said during all the year, however, perhaps not more than two months of the year. The greater part of the time we need a good supply of fans; while about one month, we need fire. Some persons who have never lived here have an idea that fire is never needed; but this is a mistake. I have heard Northern persons say that they have suffered as much from cold here as in the North. This may seem to be a strange statement, but it is true. One reason for this is that the blood of persons in this climate becomes very thin, and consequently the body is very easily chilled. Another is, that most persons wear very thin clothing. During our cold weather, we have many very cold winds from the North.

Of course no one ever had his ears or his feet frozen in Florida; but I am sure that every one who spent this winter here has been thoroughly chilled several times. The lowest the thermometer registered in this locality, which is near the central part of the state, was twenty-five degrees above zero. Some days the clouds had every appearance of snow clouds; but it did not snow. This, however, has been an unusually cold winter, here, as elsewhere. In this section of the state a few oranges were frozen, but the trees were not hurt much; some vegetables were killed, but not many; and notwithstanding the extraordinary severity of the winter, there are ripe tomatoes now; and as is well known, the tomato is a very tender plant. But our winter is over now and we are looking ahead, not anxiously, for the long hot summer. We are having our spring now. Spring here, though, does not have that fresh green appearance that it has where vegetation does not grow during the whole year. We have but few desiduous trees, and they do not shed their leaves before December, and put new ones in February. Peach trees have been blooming since Christmas; different varieties blooming at different times. Our early peaches ripen the latter part of May.

There are some beautiful gardens in this vicinity, while there are others that have had much attention, and yet are but little more than barren sand spots. Gardening is very expensive, and very uncertain here. In the summer it is too hot, and in the winter it is liable to frost. But this truly is a land of flowers. Wild flowers as well as tame ones grow to perfection. The yellow jasmine, (Gelsimium Sempervirens) in particular, has a beautiful flower. It is a wild vine which grows to be very long, and the flowers are yellow and very fragrant. All the low lands, swamps and hammocks are decorated with beautiful plants. During all the year, except about one month in winter, roses bloom freely; and such a variety as we have is not found in many places. In parts of Oregon they are equally as pretty and of as great variety, I suppose, but they do not bloom so long. Florida is a grand old state, but not a paradise as some suppose.

THE IMAGE OF GOD IN MAN.

By Rev. H. Digby Johnston [Protestant Episcopal], Chicago, Ill.

God created man in His own image.—Gen. i. 27.

(Christ) the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of His person.—Hebrew i. 1 3.

We all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image.—2 Cor. iii. 18.

The new man is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him.—Col. iii. 10.

Here we have in these several passages human creation, human redemption, human transformation; created in God's image, redeemed by God's image, transformed into God's image. Let us think now of the first of them, and see yet the traces of God's image in man.

This is not an age of self-analysis. We know and inquire very little of the essence or process of our thoughts; to use a word native to this soil, I would say we know little of the inwardness of our own best and most sacred sayings.

It would, I think, be an exercise of no small value to dive into the very core of our thoughts and know what we mean by the phrases we commonly use with regard to God and religion.

To begin with, let me ask, What do you mean by God? What thought does that word represent? What is your conception of God? If, now, we could just sit in silence ten minutes and earnestly dive into our minds with a determination to formulate our individual conception of God, and to define it, not in the well worn phrases, but in a few of our own words, I think we should find that we had set ourselves no easy task; and, at any rate, we should find it very much easier to take refuge in phrases which have become the substitutes for rather than the real expressions of thought.

But this also I feel sure of, that just so far as we succeed in defining in our own words our real conception of God, we should find that all thoughts of Him were suggested by and were after the manner of our nature. Nor do I think it possible for us to think of Him in any other way. Just so far as our language was our own, rather than the repetition of ordinary phrases taken from Scripture or our catechisms, would this, I think, become apparent to us. We have not the slightest idea of any thought, emotion, purpose, will, or act with regard to God that has not its suggestion and correspondency in ourselves. Take that away, and we have nothing left but empty terms; and I must confess that of such terms creeds and confessions and systems of theology seems to me to have been very generally constructed. We should no doubt find ourselves applying to God the word "Infinite;" but if we were to press the question further, and ask what we mean by the word "Infinite" as applied to God, we should find that what we meant was that certain specific qualities attributed by our minds to God are so attributed in infinite degree. "Nay," says some one, "I don't mean that; I mean He is infinite." But, I reply, the pronoun "He" contains no thought in itself; we want the noun for which it stands; and if I ask you to give me that, you will either repeat the name "God" or "the Supreme Being," or some other, which would carry us no further, or else you would begin to describe qualities or attributes, and say these in God are infinite; by which you would mean that they exist in Him to a degree wholly beyond any measure to which your mind can reach. Now, consider any one of the qualities which in infinite degree you thus attribute to God. What is it you consider God possesses in infinite degree? Many of you would no doubt answer Love, and such scriptural phrases as "God is love," "Herein is love," etc., would occur to you at once as justifying your answer. But now let us think of this quality of love as applied by us to God. What does it mean? Am I not right in saying it just means that quality which we have experience of in ourselves, and which we call by that name? If we do not mean that, what else do or can we mean? To use words with regard to the qualities of God which have no meaning, or in some secret sense of our own dissimilar from that in which the words are ordinarily used, is misleading and scarcely honest. But we are not conscious of any such perversion. We do not mean just what we say. By love, as applied to God, we mean just that quality which we know by that name as the best and holiest thing in ourselves.

You object, perhaps, that in us love is a very inferior, sometimes a very frivolous, even an impure and wrong thing. Yes, that is true, and we are perfectly conscious that in calling it love—perhaps from the paucity of language—we miscall it and do it injustice; for we know that love is a pure and sacred thing, and when we apply it to God we mean just that best and holiest thing which in ourselves we think of as love, the purest thing we have any experience or conception of—that holiest thing, full of paternity of which the universe and all life are full, the same quality with which a mother watches her first-born and catches the first look or smile of conscious recognition, which she interprets as "my mother," or with which she bends over her babe in the crisis of its disease, when its little life is flickering and trembling in the balance. That feeling, just that, multiplied and magnified by countless numbers to the very utmost of our power of thought, is what we attribute to God. This finite human love of ours is the image of the Infinite, Divine love; it is just that by which God has enabled us to form a conception of His love. Man's love is to man the image of God.

Exactly the same may be said of all God's qualities. His power, truth, goodness, wisdom, holiness, justice—all these are phrases which are symbols of qualities as understood by us; and we attribute those qualities to God when we use those phrases, or else they are meaningless and useless. So every quality of God is a quality of man—perfect in Him, imperfect in us, and yet existing in us in such a way that we are able to conceive of it in God. We have the key to it in ourselves, and if not we have no key to it. We can conceive of no goodness in God which is not in some measure in ourselves, and there is no good or right thing in man which is not a key to a perfect and infinite quality in God. Throughout God's entire nature and man's entire nature man is the mirror (however imperfect, however dull or obscure), the mirror and image of God. In no other way conceivable to us could God ever have enabled us to know Him or think of Him. The alternative is an abstract—no thought at all. The very fact of our being thinking beings lays us under the necessity of beholding in His face that of the great original of ourselves, or else of gazing into darkness. And so to every materialist I would say, let the soul go and you must let God go. So long as man is the creature of a God of will and purpose, so long will the image of God remain mirrored in him, an everlasting protest that man is more than dust and ashes, and his destiny immeasurably higher.

But it may be asked if these represent the best and highest that we can think of God? Does not God still remain the unknown and unknowable? Are there not heights wholly beyond our conception, and of which there is nothing of correspondency in man? I answer, yes, truly there are heights in God, in every quality of God wholly beyond our conception, but there is something answering, however feebly, even to this in man. There are in him inscrutable depths none can fathom, heights none can scale. There are in him capacities, aspirations, longings we can scarcely call finite, undeveloped affections that are but buds, suggestions of something immeasurable, vast and undefinable, which seem to throb with the majesty of the Divine, spiritual hands stretching out to the Infinite. Oh, it is the divinity that stirs within us! It is the image of the invisible God in us!

Now, all this is not metaphysical speculation. It is, I think, the clear and irresistible inference from scriptural teaching. By what language has God revealed Himself to us there? Nearly every one of the representations of Him we find there is in the form of some passion, affection, relationship or experience that is common to us as men. The God of hope, of consolation, of mercy, of compassion, of tenderness—great, terrible, angry; to be feared, loved, honored; our Master, Friend, Father, Mother, Husband. These are given to represent God's qualities and relationships toward us and our sentiments and relationships toward Him. And they are used, not to deceive or mislead us, but in truth and earnest to represent exactly what God saw these words would stand for with us. They are the symbols of man's thoughts, and He knew what thoughts. Are we wrong, then, in saying man was at first a miniature of God? All that was in God infinitely was in man finitely. That image was defaced but not destroyed by sin. But the loss was not total or absolute, and even yet every line of the original is there, and discernible there, however greatly defaced, however terribly impaired. Depraved, yes; but not wholly depraved. The image of God still, but in debris and ruins.

I cannot now dwell with the other two great thoughts of the text I have quoted. The one from the Epistle to the Hebrews tells us that Christ came as "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of His person"— came to restore to man what by sin he had lost, the second Adam, to bring man back to what by the first Adam he had lost; and two from 2 Corinthians and Colossians tell us how by that medium man is again to be transformed to that image, restored to the image of Him that created him. Redeemed—that is, restored; renewed—that is, made as of new, and that was in the image of God.—Homiletic Review.

Coincidences.

God is in coincidences. God connects the incidents. The great awakening came in South Africa apparently without human means, after the seemingly fruitless toil of ten years. But Mrs. Moffat wrote: "I hear from my friend, Miss Lees, that the very time of the awakening here was the season of extraordinary prayer among the churches at home."

Rev. L. W. Cronckite, a mission ary to Burmah during the past eleven years, uses this striking illustration, which comes closely home to us, in our special work for women and girls of heathen lands: "Regarding missionary work, one thing is important; do not underrate the vastness of the field. Take a single illustration: How many people are there in the world? That is too large; let us narrow it. How many in India? That is too large, we will make it narrowet still. How many women and girls are there in India? Suppose you send some one there to sell Bibles to every woman and girl, and he sold 20 000 a day, how long do you think it would take to furnish them with the Scriptures? Seventeen years!—Missionry Link.

By work is faith made perfect. If I live the truth, the truth will live in me until I shall become the embodiment of truth.—C. F. Williams.

"Power from on high," is the promise. It comes only from on high, for human power is weakness in the effort to rise or lift others above the world.

VOL. 5. MARCH 24, 1893. No. 120.

EDITORIAL.

HERE AND THERE.

We publish below, by request, the names and contributions of those who assisted in raising the amount apportioned to the Montana Conference as her proportion of the missionary debt, to be paid before the 31st of March, 1893:

L. B. Stateler, $25; E. J. Stanley, $10; W. M. Britt and wife $10 each; J. E. Squires, $10; S. B. Tabor and wife, $10 each; J. W. Kemper and wife, $10 each; E. L. Lee, $5; A. G. Clarke and wife, $10 each; B. E. H. Warren, $5; G. Duke, $5; L. Bramble, $5; W.T. Goulder, $4; William Beall, $5; E. G. Brooke, $5; Rachel Stanley, (little girl) $1; R. H. Shaeffer, $10; W. O. Waggener, $15. Total $185. The amount apportioned to our conference was $174, exceeded by $11. We are gratified at our success in raising this amount, though we expected no less. The people who subscribed paid it out of their own pockets. Some of them could ill-afford to do so. But their intense desire to see the Board relieved of this great burden so that it might be able to enter the needy fields lying all about us in the Northwest, as well as those in foreign climes, prompted them to do what they could. We trust that every conference in the church will do as well as Montana has done.

The following from Bishop Haygood explains itself: "Please change paper to Oxford, Ga." We have been expecting this for some time. The removal of the Bishop from his western out-post on the shores of the Pacific will bring sadness to many hearts. It is made necessary by the protracted and severe illness of his wife. We trust that the change will so restore her health that erelong they will be able to return to the West, where their presence and labors have had such a quickening and uplifting influence upon our cause. The Bishop has shown his heroic spirit by his voluntary residence on the coast during these years and has demonstrated the necessity for an episcopal residence in this region. If providence should prevent his return, we trust the vacancy will be filled by another as acceptable and efficient as he has been.

—Since the above was written we have seen a letter in the "Pacific Methodist Advocate" expressing the great pain experienced by him in being called away from the West, especially as it will be permanent. The doctors have advised Mrs. Haygood's removal to her old home and forbidden her return to California, where she cannot live. The Bishop affirms that our church has a mission in the West, and that whereever he is he will contribute to its success in every way possible.

Rev. E. P. Warren, a local preacher who lives near Spokane and who has been supplying Rockford charge, writes us that he has been compelled to give up his charge, which will be supplied by Brother Terry. His family has been sick nearly all winter. We regret to learn of this, for Brother W. is an earnest and efficient workman, and has had some good meetings. He hopes soon to visit his mother in North Carolina, whom he has not seen for fifteen years.

——

Rev. H. A. Davis, long a member of the Missouri Conference, is now living in the suburbs of Seattle, Wash., and longing for the permanent establishment of our church there. He was a young preacher on the Richmond circuit in Missouri when the writer was a small boy. We fell in love with him the first time we ever saw him and never had any occasion to fall out. At his request we committed a portion of the first chapter of John to memory, which has never been forgotten. When shall we see our church organized and doing efficient work in those great and growing centres on the Pacific coast?

——

There is to be an Undergraduates Institute in connection with the Missouri Methodist Assembly at Pertle Springs, Mo., next July. The object is to assist the undergraduates in the ministry in a more thorough preparation for their work. Lectures will be given by experienced men, and an afternoon be devoted each day to an outline of the studies in one of the four classes. It will be a fine thing for the "boys" who can attend.

——

Missouri is being stirred by revivals. The same is true of California and Oregon and portions of Montana, Idaho, and Washington. From every section the good news comes that the work of the Lord is prospering. May it go grandly forward, until holiness shall cover the land as water covers the great deep.

——

Rev. J. E. Squires has just returned from Wallace, Idaho, where he reports a good day on Sunday, and the new preacher, Brother Noland, in much better spirits and much more encouraged with the outlook.

——

While we are rejoicing over the raising up of recruits in our midst to fill up our ministerial ranks, from both private and official sources we are informed of a new arrival at the parsonage, at Willow Creek. He will divide time with the pastor in his work. He is said to be quite promising, but as he is very young, is an undergraduate, and as Brother and Sister Goulder have ample accommodations in their new parsonage, they have welcomed him most cordially to their home and will have him in training for some time to come.

——

The editor spent a part of Saturday and Sunday, the 11th and 12th of March, with the good people of Upper Bitter Root near Darby. The road was quite heavy, as the snow was just going away, but the congregations were large and very attentive, even serious, under the preaching of the Word, and our visits with the people, among whom were some friends of other days, were most delightful and refreshing.

——

The Upper Bitter Root valley seems to be specially well adapted to fruit raising. Mr. W. B. Harlan, of Como, has about 2,000 growing trees, of which nearly half are beginning to bear, and from which he gathered 1,200 or 1,500 boxes of apples last year. Mr. Southwick, an enterprising farmer from New York, has more than one thousand thrifty young trees which are just beginning to bear. This section of country has long been considered an out-of-the-way place, but it is rapidly coming to the front, and some of the finest orchards, the coziest homes, and the most thrifty farmers of the country will, in time, be located here.

——

We met a gentleman near Darby, a Mr. Southwick, who was an eye witness to the disastrous railroad wreck at Angola, New York, some fifteen years ago, in which well-filled passenger coaches left the track just at the end of a high bridge and fell fifty feet, end foremost sticking in the ice, and catching fire a moment after they fell, and some sixty persons perished. Mr. S. was on the spot two minutes after the wreck, and with strong men holding his feet he entered one of the cars at the top and rescued a number of people from the burning wreck, a volume of stifling smoke and flame issuing from the doorway as he was drawn up with the last victim that he was able to reach, who was nearly burned to death, but whose life was saved.

If men were only half as courageous and zealous in rescuing perishing men and women, who have been thrown from the King's highway and who are fast going down to the pit, how many might be snatched as brands from the eternal burning, and how many diadems might sparkle in glittering crowns in the eternal years to come?

We are deeply pained at the news of the death of the wife of Mr. Bazel Tinsley at Willow Creek, Montana, which occurred the 4th of March, the burial taking place at Boulder, her old home, on the 6th. Mr. Tinsley is the youngest son of Brother J. H. Tinsley and wife, at Willow Creek, and the deceased was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dunks, near Boulder. At both of these homes the writer was a welcome guest more than twenty years ago, and he has known these young people and felt a deep interest in them since they were little children. The deceased was a modest, amiable, sweet-spirited girl when we last saw her. May the presence of the great Comforter abide with and sustain the bereaved ones in their deep affliction.

The meeting at Corvallis has continued into the third week, with about 9 conversions and 7 accessions to the church thus far. Brother and Sister Squires and the children came over on Saturday, the 11th, to attend the quarterly meeting services, and are welcome guests in our humble home at this writing. A large congregation greeted our Brother on Sunday and listened to his earnest words and gave him a hearty shake of the hand at the close of the sermon. His return brings up precious memories of the times of refreshing witnessed during the revival services here, one year ago. We are hoping to see still greater things.

——

Rev. J. E. Squires, our Montana Presiding Elder, reports the work in good condition throughout the Conference. Owing to hard times in money matters the finances are somewhat behind, but hopes are entertained of a decided advance in this department during the next quarter. Do not fail to read the article from his pen bearing upon this subject in this issue of the paper. We cannot neglect this matter and remain guiltless.

——

The time is at hand (April 1st) for another settlement with our printers, and where, oh, where is the money coming from? If we had all that is due us on subscriptions there would be enough to settle our bill, with something to spare. Will not our friends who are delinquent take the hint, and send in the amounts justly belonging to us without delay? It will greatly relieve us, both in body and mind, and help to make the paper brighter and sunnier than it has ever been before.

——

E. G. Brooke, who has long been a liberal supporter of our church, offers to give the proceeds of 160 acres of land, which he says is cheap at ten dollars per acre, toward the erection of a church building at Whitehall. We trust that he will find a purchaser, and that his life may be spared to carry out his cherished purpose of building a house for the Lord. The land is located in Jefferson valley, not far from the town of Whitehall.

——

Rev. B. E. H. Warren, of the Belgrade circuit, writes that he has just returned home from a two weeks' meeting, sick, and that he found his wife also in poor health. We hope to hear of their speedy recovery, and that our brother is again pressing the battle in that great valley with his wonted earnestness and vigor. We learn that the meeting above mentioned resulted in the organization of a society of twelve persons.

THE OLD WAY.

While we were visiting with some kinfolks near The Dalles, Oregon, last fall, we came upon an old Methodist discipline, which was published at N. Y. in 1828, by J. Emory and B. Waugh. By consent of the owner it has fallen into our possession. It is without cover, and its pages are stained and show the marks of long and hard usage, having crossed the continent by way of Kansas and California by the ancient methods of travel. But we prize it most highly for the sake of its contents, which give us an insight into the way our fathers did the work that turned the world upside down. We thought our readers would enjoy a few extracts from it. Below we give the section that treats of the matter and manner of preaching and of conducting other public services. Some of us could follow the directions with great profit both to preacher and people at the present day. We copy verbatim from the book:

Ques. 1. What is the best general method of preaching?

Ans. 1. To convince; 2. To offer Christ; 3. To invite; 4. To build up; and to do this in some measure in every sermon.

Ques. 2. What is the most effectual way of preaching Christ?

Ans. The most effectual way of preaching Christ is to preach him in all his offices; and to declare his law as well as his gospel, both to believers and unbelievers. Let us strongly and closely insist upon inward and outward holiness in all its branches.

Ques. 3. Are there any smaller advices which ought to be of use to us?

Ans. Perhaps these: 1. Be sure never to disappoint a congregation. 2. Begin at the time appointed. 3. Let your whole deportment be serious, weighty, and solemn. 4. Always suit your subject to your audience. 5. Choose the plainest text you can. 6. Take care not to ramble, but keep to your text, and make out what you take in hand. 7. Take care of anything awkward or affected, either in your gesture, phrase or pronounciation. 8. Do not usually pray extempore above eight or ten minutes (at most) without interruption. Frequently read and enlarge upon a portion of Scripture; and let young preachers often exhort without taking a text. 10. Always avail yourself of the great festivals by preaching on the occasion.

"BY WAY OF REMEMBRANCE."

"To stir up the pure mind," to realize and act upon matters on which it has already thought and determined and planned, is one of the functions of the Holy Scriptures and of the minister of the Word of God.

I take this method of doing what seems my duty along this line, and have in mind the duty of members of the church in supporting the ministry, and the institutions of the church to which they belong.

The two points at which we seem to fail in this matter, (and I especially have in mind, the work in our own, west) are, first, we give too little; and in the second place we give irregularly, and without system with regard to time.

The Presbyterian Mission in Egypt gives an average of eighteen dollars ($18.00) per member annually, for the spread of the gospel, which I suppose would be equal to $40.00 or $50.00 per capata in this land, considering wages and prices; while our Methodists in Montana have paid about $2.00 per member during the first half of the current year. We expect them to largely exceed that during the remaining half of the year.

I have in mind several charges, where up to the second quarterly conference, there had been paid to the P. C. less than $1.00 per member, most of the membership pratically paying nothing at all.

We ought to revise our creed at this point, or our practice, or both.

Indifference or stinginess have the same fruits in this case so far as the cause that needs the support is concerned; and I verily believe God will treat them the same in the final report and settlement.

Now I am aware, as already intimated, that many who have not yet paid, mean to do so before the year closes. I hear of one charge that "brought up" the largest part of the preacher's salary last year at the last quarter, more than all the year together.

This, of course, is better than to have let him go away unpaid, but how far from the wise and safe plan of paying up at the end of the month, or at least at the end of quarter. That which God has intended shall be a blessing and a means of grace to you, if done in his way; is made a burden to you when done in another way.

Come now, my brothers and sisters in Christ; ask yourself, in the light of God's word and of the pressing needs of the church, how much you ought to "lay up," and "lay by," and then to SEE it that it be paid up at the end of each month, if not at the opening.

And now, my brethren of the holy ministry, suffer this word of exhortation: press the "claims" of the church before your people; take collections publicly, and solicit privately for missions and church extension, and bishops, and for subscriptions to the church papers, and don't wait until the close of the year to do it. History shows that the man who gets the most money for these objects will more certainly be paid his "own" salary.

I am well on in the 3rd quarter of the conference year, and I ask you to join hands with me in an honest effort to secure every claim upon us as a Conference.

Your brother in Christ,

J. E. Squires.

The Native Girl and her Shawl.

Two native African girls, who were servants in the same family, were convinced of sin; one of them, writes an African missionary, came to my house to receive instruction; I talked to her and prayed with her, but she got no rest for her soul. I left, and Mrs. Wilson while praying with her the poor girl found Jesus. Her joy was unspeakably great. She fell on her knees and kissed Mrs. Wilson's feet, and then crawled to the young woman who came with her and kissed her feet, and when I came she fell down and kissed mine, and so overwhelmed with rapturous joy and so humble, that she knew not how to express it. Her fellow native servant was in great distress, but did not get relief so quickly. I found her in an agony at the penitent rail, and her bitter confession of sin she said, 'That shawl I bought at Mullett's—that shawl! that shawl!'

"'What about it?' I inquired.

"'O, sir, part of the money for that shawl was stolen; I stole it from my mistress. I'll pay my mistress, I'll pay her all, I'll pay her double!' Her mistress was an unconverted woman, but would receive no money, and forgave her freely. Then the poor girl took the shawl, tore it to shreds, and burnt it. She had a hard struggle, but at last the dark cloud of sin and guilt rolled away, and she was made happy in Jesus her Saviour.

THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

Lesson Text.—Matt. 28:1.10.

The Lesson Story.

By Cunningham Geikie, D.D., LL. D.

The name of the great Christian festival of Easter is an appropriation of the festival of Easter, the goddess of the old heathen Germans, in whom they worshiped the kindling light of returning spring. Her name is borrowed from the word by which the Aryan forefathers of our race bodied forth to themselves the blushing morning-red, —our word, "the East." Fit emblem, the pure ideal of the returning sun, victorious over the death and gloom of winter, bringing with her the life and joy of nature and of man, for the coming forth of Him who is the resurrection and the life, from the darkness of the tomb.

On the evening of Friday, before the appearance of the stars announced the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath, a few faithful friends had taken down the body of Jesus from the cross, by permission of Pilate, and, having reverently washed away the manifold defilements of the scourging-chamber and the cross, and after having tenderly anointed the sacred body with odoriferous unguents and composed the limbs, wrapped it in the long swathings of the dead, strewing their multiplied folds with fragrant spices, —myrrh and aloes among others. Then, laying it on a bier, the group of mourners had borne it to a new and hitherto unused rock-tomb, hewn in the limestone swell which crossed a garden near at hand,—a resting-place now eagerly given by the owner, Joseph, of the village of Arimathea. He thus was true in his homage to the crucified One, though hitherto timid, in the face of the bitter animosity shown by the Jewish rulers, to whom this secret disciple belonged.

Through Friday night the Redeemer, watched by a Roman guard, had lain in the pale kingdoms of the grave. Saturday had passed, and he still rested after his manifold pains and sorrows; and now, as the night wore through, the light of the first day of the week was approaching; for the Sabbath had closed with the appearance of the stars of the Saturday evening. But he was not forgotten. Loving hearts had bought more sweet spices, that they might again anoint the form so dear to them even in its humiliation. The trumpet had not yet announced from the temple that the light had dawned, when these faithful ones were on their way, amidst the first glimmerings of the day light. As they had, it may be, to wait for the opening of the town gate, the sun had risen when they reached the tomb.

On the way they had been asking each other who would roll away the great stone for them from the door of the tomb. But they had been troubling themselves unnecessarily; for when they reached the garden they found that the stone, which was very large, had already been rolled back. The doors of the hundreds of old rock tombs still to be seen on the north side of Jerusalem, where the ground stretches away in every direction on the level of the city, roughened by outcropping edges of limestone, are very large, even where they require one to stoop on entering. A slab of stone served to close some; but others had a provision like a millstone, set in grooves, so that it could be turned away from the door or be made to cover it, as was desired. Such a stone, that can be "rolled away," is still in position at the entrance of the tomb known by the name of Helena of Abilene, a short distance north of Jerusalem, where I saw it.

But human hands, we are told, had not moved the stone that had shut in the body of our Lord. Matthew tells us that there had been "a great earthquake; for an angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled away the stone, and sat upon it. His appearance was as lightning, and his raiment white as snow," so that it is no wonder that "for fear of him the watchers did quake, and became as dead men." They must soon have recovered, and abandoned a spot so full of terrors, returning to the city to tell the "chief priests all the things that were come to pass;" for we do not read of their being seen by any of those who went to the sepulcher, or of any hindrance to free access to it.

The removal of the stone from the mouth of the tomb, and the angel's sitting on it, are told only by Matthew; but the heavenly visitant was not seen by the women on their arrival, so far as appears. Mary Magdalene, who was one of them, is spoken of only as seeing that the stone was rolled away and as having been so alarmed at this as to run back to the city, to Peter and John, to take the mysterious news to them (John 20:2.) It may be that she arrived first, and, after taking only a hasty glance, ran back to Jerusalem, in too great fear to speak of anything but the fact that the sacred tomb stood wide open. In any case, we are told that some of the women, on arriving, entered into the tomb, but only to find it empty, so far as related to the body of Jesus (Luke 24:2-3.) This, however, John tells us, Mary Magdalene had had time to notice; but of the others it is related that, "entering into the tomb, they saw a young man sitting on the right side," that of good omen, "arrayed in a white robe; and they were amazed. And he saith unto them, "Be not amazed: ye seek Jesus, the Nazarene, who has been crucified: he is risen; he is not here: behold the place where they laid him!"(Mark 16:5-6). In Luke's account we have additional details. "It came to pass," he writes, "while they were perplexed" about the body being gone, "two men stood by them in dazzling apparel: and as they were affrighted, and bowed down their faces to the earth, they said unto them, Why seek ye the living among the dead?" (Luke 24:4-5).

Matthew, Mark, and Luke are practically one in their report of the remainder of the incident. The angels, Luke tells us, added, "He is not here, but is risen: remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee, saying that the Son of man must be delivered up into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again. And they remembered his words" (Luke 24:6-8). The other accounts add that they were told to go quickly, and tell the disciples and Peter that he was risen from the dead, and that he was going before them to Galilee (Matt. 28:7; Mark 16:7.) But now Matthew supplies the signal addition to the narrative, that, as the women "departed quickly from the tomb with fear and great joy, and ran to bring the disciples word, Jesus himself met them, saying, All hail! And they came and took hold of his feet, and worshiped him. Then said Jesus unto them, "Fear not: go tell my brethren that they depart into Galilee, and there shall they see me," thus repeating the words of the angels.

There are several other appearances recorded. There is that to Mary Magdalene, who had apparently returned from the city, and was standing outside the tomb, weeping. She now saw the two angels, and they spoke to her; but still more, Jesus himself, whom she mistook for the gardener, and therefore expected to see in the poor and simple dress of a peasant, stood before her, and deigned to hold communion with her (John 20:11-18.) Next we have the appearance to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus (Luke 24:13-35); then, on the first day of the week, to the eleven, when he showed them his hands and feet; then to them again on the Sunday following, when Thomas was present; after that to a number of the disciples on the Sea of Galilee; and finally, as Paul tells us, to above five hundred brethren at once(1 Cor. 15:6).

The associations of Easter are the most sublime in our faith, since it finds its hope and triumph in the story of the resurrection morning. To use the words of St. Paul, "Christ is risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive."—S. S. Times.

TEACHING POINTS.

BY BISHOP H. W. WARREN, D. D.

"Lift your glad voices
In triumph on high,
For Jesus has risen,
And man cannot die."

1. Indubitably there have been resurrections,—notably of Christ, undeniably of half a dozen men. Some of these are as well authenticated as the landing of Columbus. Christ made ten recorded appearances to hundreds of people who knew him. That fact should be as really a part of our mental being as that we must die.

2. All resurrections have been the result of supernatural power. No man pretended to effect them through his own power. Behind the veil of our flesh there is a God.

3. If we may thus have dealings with God after death, we may have dealings with him in life. He is not the God of the dead, but of the living. There are soul-resurrections all along through time, as really as resurrections of body.

4. The power of death is seen to be but slight on those who are joined to "The Life." It touches the body merely, and for a little time only. Christ came back the same Jesus, —the same in friendships, objects, and ends of being. One of his first words to us was, "Be not afraid."

5. His next word to us may be, when we are passing through the waters, "Lo, I am with you, be not afraid."

6. Death has really been conquered by one who did it for us. We give him our hearts in holy love, our hands for guidance through the dreaded dark. Easter has a thousand happy thoughts and joys, but this is the main one.

7. Life broadens into more than oceanic proportions. Our lives take on majestic features, and our plans an age-long permanence.—S. S. Times.

If we love God supremely we will love our neighbor as ourselves.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PALOUSE POINTERS.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—We have just closed a four weeks' battle at Palouse. The powers of darkness are strongly entrenched here, and it will take frequent and persistent efforts to secure an extensive revival.

While our meeting did not accomplish all we hoped for, yet it was a grand success.

There were a number of conversions and reclamations, and last Sunday morning I received into the church 13 members; five by certificate, and eight upon profession of faith.

The church is much revived and encouraged.

We organized, last Sunday afternoon, a W. P. A. and H. M. Society.

We hope to secure a parsonage for this charge before conference.

Bro. Skee, who seems to be a natural mechanic and architect, has drawn a design for remodeling the old church building.

This old church building is the first ever erected in Palouse City, and was bought by us from the M. E. Church, with the lot upon which it stood.

We moved it back and built the new church on the corner.

This old building is 24x34 feet with 14 foot walls. Bro. Skee thinks that by an out-lay of $300.00 it may be transformed into the best and most commodious parsonage in the Conference.

How we shall succeed in doing it I don't know; as we still owe $500.00 to the Board of Church Extension on the lot, but we will do the best we can.

A parsonage is a necessity. The preacher has already paid out, during his pastorate here, more than enough to do this work.

Bro. R. B. Swift, W. S. Hornbuckle, and A. Y. Skee all assisted us at different times during the meeting. Their faithful labors were owned of God and the full results only eternity can reveal. Bro. Skee was with me nearly two weeks. He is planning a camp-meeting for next summer. If I can do him as faithful service then as he gave us, I shall be glad.

It is seldom that this scribe has had the pleasure of reporting "poundings," during his service in the Northwest, but I am glad to mention the kind thoughtfulness of the ladies of my congregation, who bought for their pastor a nice new suit of clothes during our meeting. Blessings on the dear girls! If they can now succeed in securing that parsonage, it will be a great help to the charge and its future pastors.

WILLOW CREEK NOTES.

A few items may be of interest to some of your many readers.

We are having delightful winter weather at present (March 7th). Quite a number of old and young folks gave Brother Goulder a surprise donation party a short time ago on Tuesday night, Feb. 28th. We had a splendid time. Brother Goulder is a live man and is much liked by the people in this community.

At the parsonage at Willow Creek, on the 5th of March, there was born to Rev. W. T. Goulder and wife a son. May the Lord bless both parents and child, and may the latter grow up to be a God-fearing man.

The "Methodist" is doing a good work in carrying the glad tidings of great joy to so many people. May it be the means of bringing very many to Christ. It is a welcome visitor to our home, for it reminds us of our duty, which is, to love God with all our mind and might and to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to Him, which is our reasonble service. Oh, what a blessed assurance to know that Jesus is ours, and to have a foretaste of glory divine, as we pursue our journey to the New Jerusalem, the city of God, there to praise Him forever and ever.

—T. J. W.

—o—

FROM "THE CITY BY THE SEA."

Dear Bro. Stanley—If I were to fulfill my promises I'd write oftener for your sprigbtly, sunshiny paper. Usually I do not write for public print unless I have something to say. You may think I am "wide off the mark" this time.

We are now in the middle of the conference year, and I hope "in the middle of the road," so to speak, as well. Good reports from our L. A. Conference pastors are noted from week to week in our coast paper.

There have been a great many conversions and quite an accession to the church during the past three months. Revivals seem to be the order of the day in Southern California. There seem to be pulsations of new life in all the denominations. Perhaps the Salvation Army, who are occupying every town and city in this section, are "waking us up!" This branch of Christ's kingdom is solving the knotty problem so long discussed, "whereased", and "resolved" upon, by "we" of the more dignified lines of work, i. e., "How to reach the masses." And the solution is not by any complicated rules, but profoundly simply putting into practice what Dr. Jno. Matthews calls "leg theology" —GOING after the masses. Much of the religion of to-day is confined to philosophy-theology, and mere intellectual force, and is far removed from the practical work of soul-saving. God is greatly blessing the Salvation Army; they are honoring Him. Sam Jones says, "the only difference between the Salvation Army of to-day and the Methodists of one hundred years ago, is that the Methodists were too poor to buy a drum and uniform."

Many are prone to associate Christianity with culture refinement, and stilted dignity, hence the condition of the masses being vastly removed from these lofty requirements, are thoughtlessly let alone.

Some of our men, tried and true, transferred east at our last session; others came to take their places, and so far as I have heard, the appointments are happily filled. In this little "City by the Sea" we are pushing the battle to the gates. Have had my maiden experience at street preaching with Y. M. C. A. trying to "reach the masses."

The good Lord is blessing our efforts. My appeal in behalf of our new parsonge, is being responded to; already orders are coming in. The rains continue to fall. There has been about 19 inches since October a sufficiency to insure good crops.

Bishop Haygood says: "There is a heap in "quitting sense." You think so too, so I'll quit.

Squires, Shaeffer, Alton, and the old veteran Stateler are all my personal friends. The good Lord bless you with success.

Yours,
Sam. M. Chase.

A CONVENTION OF CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

The Convention of Christian workers, called by the Central Committee of the Parsonage and Home Mission Society—of which notice has been given—will be held in St. Louis, Mo., May 9th to 11th, 1893. This is the first meeting of the kind ever held in our church, and will be a very important and interesting occasion to all interested in city evangelization and other forms of home mission work, to be done under the auspices of the M. E. church, South. Good speakers will be in attendance and many important matters will be discussed.

Those desiring to attend can address either the secretary of the conference, Mrs. T. M. Finney, 4028 Morgan street, St. Louis, Mo.; the President of the St. Louis Conference, Mrs. John Mathews, 4365 Bell ave., St. Louis, Mo.; or Miss M. C. Lee, 3502 Franklin St., St. Louis, Mo. Those wishing further information in regard to the matter should address Miss Lucinda B. Helm, Gen'l Secretary, 1500 Third ave., Louisville, Ky.

IDE'S NEW MAP OF MONTANA,—1893.

This map exhibits all the new counties, towns, post-offices, railroads, rivers and creeks, and water courses in the state. It is indexed, giving a complete list of all the towns, so that you can locate any place in the state instantly. It is a correct transcript from the records in the Surveyor General's office, showing the surveyed districts, and is a complete check map for all parts of the state.

This map is adapted to the wants of business men as well as that of schools, colleges, railroads, and scientific men. Being the standard map of the state, surveyors will appreciate its utility.

It is mounted on muslin, with rollers; also put up in pocket form suitable for travelers. No pains or cost have been spared to make it a complete and valuable work.

Scale 12 miles to 1 inch. Size 60x34 inches.

Prices—Mounted, $5. Pocket Form, $1. Maps of all the counties in the state now being made. Spring rollers and map-cases for keeping maps clean. Write to us for anything in the map line.

Ide & Company, Map Publishers, Room 21 Bailey Block, Helena, Mont.

We will send copy of State Map and any one County to one person for $8.

News and Brevities.

The "Ram's Horn" remarks: "The devil is not afraid of your Bible, if the dust is on it."

Half a million persons, it is said, are in one way and another employed on the Sabbath in connection with the drink traffic, and two hundred thousand of these are young women.

No man but a total abstainer is allowed, under the laws of Michigan, to be employed as engineer, train-dispatcher, fireman, brakeman, or other railroad servant. Any roilroad violating the law is liable to a fine of five hundred dollars for each offense.

There is no alienation of land in Africa, all being held by the kings and chiefs in trust for the people; and every decree is proclaimed "in the name of the people."

Miss Madden has traveled 2,000 miles on horseback in her mission for the lepers of Siberia. She has secured $5,000 for a hospital. It is said that she has become convinced that a plant grows which is a sure cure for leprosy. A leper cast out from human habitation, who slept upon the ground in the fields, came in contact with it and was cured. Efforts are being made to identify the plaut and bring it into use.

There are said to be extant not less than 400,000 Christian hymns. Germany heads the list with 100,000. The most prolific writer of hymns was Charles Wesley, who wrote 6,500. Next to him came James Edmeston, who wrote 2,000. Isaac Watts, whose hymns are among the most popular, wrote about 400. Only about one in ten of the hymns written is worthy to be pronounced "classical and immortal." Fanny Crosby, the most prolific of living hymn writers, has produced about 2,000 hymns and religious songs.

—Love is a priceless jewel.

TEMPERANCE.

Mrs. Stowe was asked why she didn't write a book on temperance like "Uncle Tom's Cabin," on slavery. She replied, "I have thought of doing so, but it would be too dreadful to read."

Bishop Galloway, of the M. E. Church, South, says: "Mental suasion for the man who thinks, moral suasion for the man who drinks; legal suasion for the liquor seller; and prison suasion for the other fellow."

Dr. Moore, of the "Western Chr. Advocate, has coined a new word. He suggests that we drop the word saloon and use "drunkery." Capital!

Results of Prohibition.

Ex-Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, though not a prohibitionist, says of the good results of prohibition in his state: "Many intemperate men have been redeemed; the weak have been fortified; the young have been saved from temptation; the families of the poor have been better clothed, fed and educated; and the social condition has been perceptibly elevated. The grocery merchants and other dealers say that their bills are more promptly paid, and the records of the courts showed a marked decrease in crime. The predicsions of its opponents have not been verified. Immigration has not been repelled, nor capital averted from the state."

Four years ago the Swiss government undertook the control of the traffic in intoxicants in that country. Intemperance had grown to be a gigantic evil, and a federal monopoly was created for the purpose of curbing it. A fourfold purpose was kept in view—to sell only pure spirits; to diminish as far as possible the consumption of spirits; to use a tenth of the net revenue in fighting the causes and affects of intemperance; and to distribute the rest among the cantons. It appears from an official report that the plan has been successful to a remarkable degree. The average consumption of spirits for each individual of the population has steadily gone down from 10.16 litres in 1885 to 6.27 litres in 1890. The quality of the liquor sold has been much improved, and the cantons have derived a considerable revenue from the profits of the monopoly. The plan may not be the best—no license scheme whatever will satisfy prohibitionists—but it has certainly worked well in Switzerland, and it may be the stepping-stone to something better.

Better is the poor that walketh in his uprightness, than he that is perverse in his ways though he be rich. —Prov. xxviii. 6.

A faithful man shall abound with blessings, but he that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent.—Prov. xxviii. 20.

Items and Notes.

There are estimated to be about 420,000,000 Christians in the world.

Fifty years ago Delitzsch translated the New Testament into Hebrew.

The best Christian scholarship of Germany stands by the Old Testament.

By a recent census Christianity stands third in numbers in the religions of India.

The endowment of Chicago University now approaches seven millions; students, six hundred.

Baron Rothschild has made an immense purchase of land on the River Jordan to colonize his kindred.

In the year 1881, 4,329 wretched women, drunk and incapable, were taken up in the streets of Glasgow, Scotland. In 1891 the number had increased to 6,120.

The revival of the primitive ministry of women is the glory of the Lutheran Church in Germany. The first deaconess institution was established in 1833, and there are now no less than thirty-four "mother houses," and nearly 2,000 deaconesses, the one best known on the long roll being that sweet flower of Christian womanhood, the noble and devoted English woman, Florence Nightingale.

Mr. Gladstone says: "Let us all carry with us, deeply stamped upon our hearts and minds, a sense of shame for the great plague of drunkenness which goes through the land sapping and undermining character, breaking up the peace of families, oftentimes choosing for its victims, not the men or the women originally the worst, but persons of strong social susceptibility, and open in special respects to temptation. This great plague and curse, gentlemen, let us all remember, is a national curse, calamity and scandal."

A total of $29,061,927 was contributed during the past year in sums of $10,000 and upward to the foundation or support of universities, colleges, seminaries, manual training schools, churches, libraries, museums, art collections, etc.

The Marechal Booth-Clibborn writes in the Salvation Army's "War Cry" that she "spent a whole morning visiting New York millionaires," and that, "though, sometimes she did not meet with even common politeness, they were generally gushing and ready with any amount of sympathetic talk." As for cash, she didn't collect her car-fare, she says.

Three hundred and fifty-two thousand two hundred and thirty-one teachers are employed in the public schools of the United States. This would give an average of nearly thirty-five pupils to each teacher. Deducting for county and city superintendents, say 50,000, would give an average of forty pupils for each teacher. Of these teachers, 227,200 are females and 125,000 are males. The average wages are, for males $42.43; for females, $34 27 per month.

The "Epworth Herald" speaks of the proposed ten million cathedral for New York as a piece of religious folly and so it is. We once made a tour of Europe, and returned with a conviction as deep as the ocean that the poverty of the lower classes there is owing about equally to three things—the cathedrals, the standing armies, and the drinking customs. We hope America may soon free herself from the last, and forever remain free from the other two.

Careful investigations disclose the fact that in the German Empire alcoholic drinks absorb twice as much money as bread, three times as much as lodging or house rent, eight times as much as fuel. Public education and the army each cost a fourth of the sum spent on alcohol. All the direct taxes of Prussia and all the indirect taxes of the empire, taken together, fall short by a great deal, of the sum expended annually upon alcoholic liquors.

Railway prohibition is becoming an important and helpful auxiliary to the general temperance movement. It is announced that President Arthur Corbin, of the Long Island railroad, has recently issued an order which declares that the heads of the departments are expected to dismiss every employee who is addicted to drink, and every employee who is known to go into a place where drink is sold while he is on duty must be promptly dismissed. The order also states that where applicants for employment are to be considered, the proference is to be given to those who do not use intoxicating liquors.

Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storm of time can never destroy. Write your name in kindness, love and mercy on the hearts of the thousand you come in contact with year by year; you will never be forgotten. No; your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts you leave behind as the stars on the brow of evening. Good deeds will shine as the stars of heaven.—Chalmers.

Christian women in the Kolhapur church, India, have a Benevolent Sosiety, and earn money by the sale of needle work ahd gifts This is to be used in repairing the City Chapel.

All Europe could be put into an area in central Africa which has not a single missionary. If missionaries were as scarce here as there many of our states would be without a single Christian worker. We need to dwell on this and kindred facts pretty often before we fully realize the privileges of a Christian country.

J. H. Taylor, founder of the Chinese Island Mission, says that if success be really desired, there must be Christly giving and Christly service. Not that which is done for Christ's sake merely, but that which is done after Christ's pattern.

The Bible Tried.

The experience of the race has settled a few things. Water quenches thirst, bread satisfies hunger, a few medicines are specific for certain diseases. Thirty-three centuries of accredited history have proved the Bible, and the Bible alone, meets the necessities of the human race.

All men's wants are here supplied. All his ills are here remedied. All his wrongs are here redressed. His spiritual nature, always and everywhere seeking sustenance and rest, always and everywhere seeks in vain until, coming to this divine source, it finds the bread, which eating, it hungers no more, the rest, which securing, its weariness is at an end.

There is no member of the great family of man who does not want deliverance from his guilt; the one only relief is here made known: a pure and perfect object for his affections; such a being the Bible alone reveals: a certain guide to virtue; all other guides flash false lights on our way: a remedy for a disordered nature; here is proffered the only cure: relief from the restless discontent of the heart; here, and here only, is the needed rest: certain knowledge of the dread hereafter; here "life and immortality are brought to light;" supporting strength in the dying hour; this book alone points out the way to achieve victory over "the last enemy," death.

The ignorance, the poverty, the oppression, the wrong, the misery of arth's teeming millions, all find their cure in proportion as these leaves from the "tree of life," "for the healing of the nations," are scattered over the earth, and brought into contact with the fevered hearts of men.

Is this beautiful and brilliant theory to fade away like many a philosopher's dream? Nay, the ages of time and the millions of earth's groaning denizens bear witness to these gracious truths. "The word of the Lord is TRIED," and a countless multitude of witnesses attest its truth. Nations have accepted it and been lifted into prominence and power. Individuals in all classes and conditions have tested its value and found solace and strength. The poor man tried its virtue, and it opened to him imperishable treasures more valued than the wealth of a kingdom. That slave suffering the bondage of body, or mind, or soul, sought its proffered deliverance, and his shackles fell off, while his prison doors flew open, and he walked forth into "the glorious liberty of the sons of God." That sorrowful weeper drank at this sacred fount, and his tears became as crystal lenses through which he saw the hand of love above him, and the land of hope before him, and his weeping was changed into joy. That bereaved one with a smitten heart, sighing for

> .....The touch of a vanquished hand,
> And the sound of a voice that is still!

Came hither for its holy consolations, and heard a precious message falling from the lips of a mighty Conqueror, saying, "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death;" and through falling tears he beheld the "vanished hand" beckoning, and heard the "voice" that was "still" calling, to a reunion amid the changeless scenes of the golden city above.

Yes, this sacred book is "tried," and proved true in its every promise and prophecy and warning.

It reveals the worth of man as immeasurably greater than the whole material universe, and makes manifest the tender sympathy of our common Father, so that we cannot but believe with an illustrious astronomer, that "a single tear ebbing from the heart of humble sorrow is of more value in the sight of God than a legion of suns."—The Rev. C. H. Payne, D. D.

SERVING THE FUTURE.

I have said you cannot serve the past, but you can serve the future. This generation contains all that are coming. Suppose that David, some day in his wanderings, when he had got upon the goodly mountain, and sat down weary at the eventide under some great cedar, the pomegranate blossoms blooming before him, and with his great poet eye looked out across the gleaming Mediterranean away to yonder sun which was going to lose itself, and between him and the sun saw a Syrian sail mysteriously flickering on the borders of he knew not what, suppose he had said to himself, "What is there, there away beyond the waters, in the strange realm where the sun loses himself at night-time?" and suppose then that some angel had then been commissioned just to lift up the veil and permit him to cross the Mediterranean, then the continent of Europe, then across another sea, until away in the cold and foggy seas of the north he beholds some island lying, and sees the people of some distant generation. Up there spring towers and spires. God's Sabbath day sounds upon the land, and there they come, fathers and mothers, boys and girls, in the streets by thousands and tens of thousands, crowding to worship the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. In families, and tribes, and multitudes, they lift up their Sabbath song, and proclaim the God of Israel, "Bless the Lord, O my soul," ringing up to the heavens in a language David never heard. He might have said. "Am I to serve these distant generations?" Yes; he served your mother many a time, and my mother; he has served you, and he has served me. He has been serving us this day, and we have sometimes heard the hundredth psalm, the words of David, in one age, the music of Luther in another age, the language of our mothers, and our fathers, and our own voices, all uniting, binding the angels of the nations together in the one great work of praising God. So serve your own generation, and you serve every other. Serve the men and women now living, and you serve all that are yet to come. Working for this moment, you are working for all future times; bringing one poor boy to Christ, bringing one lost girl back to the Savior, you are working for unborn generations, and the influence of your action will never be lost.—The Rev. Wm. Arthur, M. A.

"MANLESS CHURCHES."

"The Epworth Herald" had a suggestive editorial on "Manless Churches." The reasons assigned by the editor are the following: "Temptations incident to public life;" "constantly exposed to worldly influences;" "opportunity to see more of the inconsistencies of professing Christians;" "the standards of manhood are often very low among men;" "the multiplication of social organizations;" "the lodge room;" "they are pushed with secular duties."

While these exert great influence—some of them very great—in turning the attention of boys and young men, and consequently old men, from Christ and his Church, quite extended observation warrants the conclusion that improper training of boys, the street school, the lounging place, the place of vile resort for the young during the formative period of character, the degrading tobacco habit, the seductive influence of light drinks, the destroying effects of the wine cup, the ravages of the rum fiend, and the insidious snares of cheap infidelity, must be counted in the list of reasons for the sad and alarming fact that men are not, as a class, in the, church.

Probably the two most potent influences determining men from Christ and his Church are: first, the lodge answering for the Church, "better than the Church," many say; and second, the drink custom.

The remedy is the Gospel. Let it be applied all along lines. Begin at the cradle. Let it have its sway in the home. Teach and preach Christ. Exalt his Church. Let all see that it is a divine institution. Hand-to-hand work is demanded with young men. Pentecostal power upon the churches is needed to turn he tide toward Christ and his Church. Let the leaders of the sacramental hosts call the people to "tarry until they shall be endued with power from on high."

A bakery started in 1889 has proved a means of support to some poor women who have come to the missionaries for help. The baker has been very particular to give employment to Christian women and those showing a desire to be Christians, in preference to all others. About six women have been usually employed at once to grind, and two of them have this year become Christians.—Missionary Link.

Hope is a star of great lustre.

"The Stream that Never Dries up."

I was once stopping at a village on the Welsh coast, where the people had bring all the water from a well.

"Is this well ever dry?" inquired I of a young girl who came to draw water.

"Dry? Yes, ma'am; very often in hot weather."

"And where do you go for water then?"

"To the spring a little way out of town."

"And if that spring dries up?"

"Why, then we go to the spring higher up, the best water of all."

"But if the stream higher up fails?"

"Why, ma'am, that stream never dries up—never. It is always the the same, winter and summer."

I went to this precious brook which "never dries up." It was a clear sparkling rivulet, coming down the high hill—not with a torrent leap and roar, but soft murmur of fullness and freedom. It flowed down to the highway side; it was within reach of every child's pitcher; it was enough for every empty vessel. The small bird came down thither to drink; the sheep and lambs had trodden down a little path to its brink. The thirsty beasts of burden, along the dusty road, knew the way to the stream that "never dries up."

It reminded me of the waters of life and salvation flowing from the "Rock of Ages" and brought within the reach of all men by the gospel of Jesus Christ. Every other brook may grow dry in the days of drought and adversity, but this heavenly spring never ceases to flow.—Presbyterian.

A Heroic Life.

A few years ago a young lady went out to India as a missionary. Some time after she got there she felt strange pains in her finger-joints, which, from what she knew of the disease, she thought might be caused by leprosy. It came, probably, from her handling the pice, or copper coin, of that country. She did not tell anybody of her fears, but soon came to this country. While here she consulted two good doctors, who confirmed her fears. When she heard their decision she at once made up her mind that she would go back to India as soon as she possibly could She told the family that the parting would be less hard if she did not kiss or shake hands with them. Now she is living among the lepers, teaching them the way of life. Soon afterwards she wrote a letter to her parents, saying that she could never see them again except in heaven. She did not think her life wasted, but cheerfully gave up friends, home, and every comfort for the sake of the work her Master had given her.

The Fruit of One Seed Sowing.

It seems to some a little thing,
To sow a single seed;
But see the harvest when it comes,
Astonishing indeed!
The sowing is a penny tract,
To Richard Baxter given;
It leads him to the cross of Christ,
And in the way to Heaven.

Now happy in a Saviour's love,
He, too, sows precious seed;
From which another harvest comes,
Fruit of his noble deeds:
Great multitudes are brought to Christ,
Who now His praises sing;
One Phillip Doddridge swells their songs,
To the eternal King.

He, too, in turn, broadcasts the seeds
Of gospel truth and grace;
Ten thousand turn away from sin,
To seek the Saviour's face;
Among the numbers saved through him,
Was the great Wilberforce;
Who kept the faith until the close
Of a bright Christian course.

Weeping and bearing precious seed,
Like those before him gone;
He leads the way to God and Heaven,
And thousands follow on:
Increasing numbers throng the way,
Leigh Richmond is brought in;
A monument of saving grace,
Washed and redeemed from sin.

He takes his pen and writes a book,
About a peasant maid;
The daughter of a Dairyman,
Whose faith in God is staid:
Millions of copies in all tongues,
The Saviour's love proclaim;
And multitudes, no man can tell,
Believe on Jesus' name.

Harvests like these of precious souls,
Are gathered from one seed;
The little tract a woman sows,
A thoughtful, happy deed:
May you and I sow precious seed,
The coming harvest wait:
Gather the fruit beyond the sky,
Within the pearly gates.

From House to House.

The conquests of Christianity have been made largely by direct personal effort, and in no small measure by house visitation. This is particularly true of Methodism. We would not be a stickler for old methods simply because they are old, but when they have been proven by centuries of successful trial, we take great risk in abandoning, or even neglecting them. Our fathers were in earnest in their work of trying to save men. The following paragraphs from the old discipline, that we spoke of last week, in visiting from house to house, and personal care and solicitude for the souls of men, so fully express our great need at the present day that we have transferred them to these columns. If they come to reprove us for our carelessness and to provoke us to love and good works along this line in the futurewe shall rejoice. Possibly we shall continue the same subject next week:

Question 1. How can we further assist those under our care?

Answer. By instructing them at their honses. What unspeakable need is there of this! The world says, "The Methodists are no better than other people." This is not true in general: but (1) personal religion, either towards God or man, is too superficial among us. We can but just touch on a few particulars. How little faith is there among us! How little communion there is with God, how little living in heaven, walking in eternity, deadness to every creature? How much love of the world! Desire of pleasure, of ease, of getting money. How little brotherly love! What continual judging one another! What gossiping, evil speaking, tale bearing! What want of moral honesty. To instance only one particular: Who does as he would be done by, in buying or selling?

2. Family religion is wanting in many branches. And what avails public preaching alone, though we would preach like angels? We must, yea, every traveling preacher must, instruct the people from house to house. Till this be done, and that in good earnest, the Methodists will be no better.

Our religion is not sufficiently deep, universal, uniform: but superficial, partial, uneven. It will be so till we spend half so much time in this visiting, as we now do in talking uselessly. Can we find a better method of doing this than Mr. Baxter's? If not, let us adopt it without delay. His whole tract, entitled, "Gildas Salvianus," is well worth a careful perusal. Speaking of this visiting from house to house, he says: (p. 351.) "We shall find many hindrances, both in ourselves and in the people.

1. In ourselves there is much dullness and laziness, so that there will be much ado to get us to be faithful in our work.

2. We have a base, man-pleasing temper, so that we let them perish rather than lose their love. We let them go quietly to hell, lest we should offend them.

3. Some of us have a foolish bashfulness. We know not how to begin, and blush to contradict the devil.

4. But the greater hindrance is weakness of faith. Our whole motion is weak, because the spring of it is weak.

5. Lastly, we are unskillful in the work, How few know how to deal with men, so as to get within them, and suit all our discourse to their several conditions and tempers: to choose the fittest subjects, and to follow them with a holy mixture of seriousness, terror, love, and weakness?

But undoubtedly this private application is implied in those solemn words of the apostle: "I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing, preach the word: be instant in season and out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long suffering."

O, brethren, if we could set this work on foot in all our societies, and prosecute it zealously, what glory would redound to God!—If the common lukewarmness were banished, and every shop and every house, busied in speaking of the word and works of God; surely God would dwell in our habitations. and make us his delight.

And this is absolutely necessary to the welfare of our people, some of whom neither repent nor believe to this day. Look around, and see how many of them are in apparent danger of damnation. And how can you walk and talk and be merry with such people, when you know their case? When you look them in the face you should break forth into tears as the prophet did when he looked upon Hazael, and then set on them with the most vehement exhortations. Oh, for God's sake and the sake of poor souls, bestir yourselves, and spare no pains that may conduce to their salvation!

What cause have we to bleed before the Lord that we have so long neglected this work? If we had engaged in it sooner, how many more might have been brought to Christ? And how much holier and happier might our societies have been before now. And why might we not have done it sooner? There were many hindrances, and so there always will be. But the greatest hindrance is in ourselves, in our littleness of faith and love.

THIS AND THAT.

A number of our readers have expressed their appreciation of the Sunday school lesson helps published in the "Montana Methodist," and they are greatly disappointed when the paper fails to arrive on time. A lady teacher in the Butte public schools says that she puts the "Methodist" by for Sunday reading. An article in its columns stirred the muses in good Brother Cope's mind and the result is an excellent poem for the first page of this issue. Let all our friends rally and help our paper in its mission of good to its thousands of readers. Dear brother, are you doing your whole duty in this respect?

The March number of the Woman's Missionary Advocate contains an elaborate and excellent program for the Easter service to be held in our churches the 2nd of April, in the interest of the Scarret Bible Training School at Kansas City, Mo. It was prepared by Miss Belle H. Bennett, Miss Mary Helm and Mrs. S. H. Trueheart. It will afford splendid exercise for the children, instructive and profitable entertainment for the grown people and render assistance to a noble cause.

Ball-rooms, bar-rooms, bagnios—this is the road so many travel to death. They start in the ball-room, pass through the bar-room, and end in the bagnio. And some insane mothers, as if afraid their children would not begin this hellward road in the ball-room of their own accord, start them in their tender years in the kindergarden of hell—a dancing school.—Tennessee Methodist.

Just as we go to press the Tennesee Methodist brings the announcement of the death of Dr. E. E. Wiley, at Emory, Va., March 13th. His has been a long and useful life. He did not cease preaching until a few weeks ago. He rendered a service to the Montana Conference of which but a few of our people are aware. When this writer appeared before the Board of Missions at its meeting in Centenary Church, St. Louis, in 1890, and made an earnest plea for a greater increase in the appropriation to Montana than the committee on estimates had allowed, Dr. Wiley was a member of that body. The bishop who had charge of our work, as well as every other member of the Board, remained silent. We felt that a crisis was at hand and whispered to Dr. Wiley who sat near, and whose placid and kindly face invited our approach, that we must have at least six thousand dollars for Montana. Our brother's great heart responded to our appeal and he promptly moved that six thousand dollars be appropriated to Montana, and his motion prevailed He had been a missionary and he knew how to sympathize with his brethren who were on the outposts of the church. He ceased at once to labor and to live. As the sun of a bright morning was rising his soul mounted to its home in the skies. Peace to his ashes.

Don't forget to send in the amount of your indebtedness to the "Montana Methodist." We need it right now.

From Brother Cope.

CHILLICOTHE, MO., Mar. 15.

My Dear Brother in Christ:— There was an article in the "Montana Methodist" a few weeks ago that greatly interested me, and I doubt not many other of your readers. I have put some of the facts of that article in verse, and herewith enclose the production, that you may see it, and if you judge fit, show it to your readers.

Doctor M. B. Chapman, editor of the "St. Louis Christian Advocate," spent last Sabbath in Chillicothe, preaching two excellent sermons, to the pleasure and delight of Dr. Dinwiddie's church and congregation. He reports the "Advocate" in a prosperous condition, its circulation having a healthy growth. The senior editor, Dr. D. R. McAnally, is at his post of duty, but too feeble to do much work. But the work that he has already done will follow him, to bless the generations yet to come.

Rev. J. S. Smith, of our Conference, on invitation of Dr. Dinwiddie, came recently and preached a series of sermons on "Baptism," that were well received and helpful,every way. The sermons were strong, vigorous, weighty; eloquently delivered, and with the unction and seal of the Holy Spirit. Brother Smith would do well to repeat these sermons often, even seeking to get such important and wholesome doctrines before the people. The young and rising generation need light on the "one baptism," the mode of baptism, and above all, on infant baptism.

I thank you again for calling attention, through the columns of your paper, to my little books, "The Great Evil and its Remedy," and the "Christian Ministry." Retail price of each book, is fifty cents; one-third discount off, where half dozen copies or more, are ordered at once. I solicit orders, and give parties their own time to sell and pay for the books. Would like to send a few thousand copies out west. In Christian bonds. S. W. COPE.

Pendleton District.

Dear Methodist:—The little Methodist continues to visit us, bringing tidings of joy and gladness.

We cannot afford to dismiss this little friend from the mountains of Montana. I am almost around the second time, on the Pendleton District. I am here now with Bro. Barnhart, and will hold his Q. M. Saturday and Sunday, and then I go to Eagle Valley, to hold Bro. Yoakum's Q. M. and dedicate the new church there.

Our pastors on the district are active, and faithful, and almost every charge has been blest with a revival. At this point, Express, they have been blest with a wonderful revival. Almost this entire community has awakened, and about 30 have been added to the church. Bro. Barnhart is rejoicing in the good work. Bros. Larkin and Eagle are doing a good work in Idaho; have held revival meetings at Nampa and at Sabbath home "church," resulting in a number of conversions and accessions to the church.

Adventism seems to be thriving in Boise Valley, building up by proselyting from other churches. Sabbatarian, Soul-sleeping, Deep Water, so-called Christian people, pushing their doctrines into the homes of our people, are doing much mischief, and turning many away from the faith, ought to be met, and refuted, as Judazing Saducees. Can you come to our district conference at Heppner, June 1? We will be glad to meet you there?

My heart has been chastened by sorrow since I saw you, Bro. My dear father and mother have been taken from us, but we sorrow not as those who have no hope. An altar, where family prayer has been held almost 50 years, is silent. My home, the home where father, mother, brothers and sisters loved to meet, is no more here, but they are gathering in "Our Father's home above," where we shall all meet again. Till then, we say farewell.

M. V. HOWARD.

NASHVILLE, TENN.

Dear Brother Stanley:—Yours of the 4th. received. I enclose you receipt for the $70. We cordially appreciate the zeal with which you have labored in this matter, and thank you for it.

You need not be entirely discouraged as to the regular collections. We are using every means at our command to avert their falling behind last year, and it is not yet certain that we shall not succeed. Hope for the best, and pray that God will help us at this point.

Yours Cordially,

From Wallace, Idaho.

WALLACE, IDAHO.

My Dear Brother:—I appreciate very much your words of warm welcome and of sincere sympathy. You have travelled this road yourself: you know what it is to leave the hearthstone of home, and to pitch a moving tent in a strange land and among stranger hearts. Truly "a fellow-feeling makes one wondrous kind;" and the more so, when the love of Christ constraineth.

Yes, sir; to be moved from my State to this, at this season of the year, is very much like being taken from a nice warm fire and dumped into a snow-drift. You speak from a literal experience, I judge; so can appreciate the full force of your figure. I have not yet been dumped into a snow-drift" other than figuratively.

To change the figure, I know that to be suddenly transferred thus, is like being plucked up by the roots and tossed from the Atlantic over a continental fence to the Pacific Slope, to revive, if you fall roots down, but to wilt, if they point back to the spot from which you were thrown. I made many a revolution in the air before I struck this place; so I hardly know how I feel. Sometimes I think the heart-roots point back, and that to grow here would be to reverse the order of nature; but even that is possible, if God work in us both to will and to do.

They tell me that I fell into the deepest gulch when I landed in Wallace. I may then raise my head in hope if ever the ecclesiastical gardner's hand is placed around my neck to again transplant me.

You have been in Wallace: you know how lavish the God of Nature has been in beautifying it; how the mountains enfold it as in arms of snow on the bosom of nature; how lifting up the eyes unto the hills whence cometh our help, is like praying with help at our door.

It seems wonderful to me that amidst this elevating inanimate nature, human nature can sink so low as it does here at times. These high mountains alone would seem enough to inspire men to high and holy thought; but dispite these and the revealed Word, the wicked pass on and are punished.

I look to God alone for strength as I take up my work in this place. I trust that with the melting of this Winter's snow, there may be a spiritual Spring to quicken into new life, souls so long chilled by sin.

I send to you herein the amount of the interest on our church debt which you so kindly advanced for us.

The good Master bless you in your work. Of course, I would have you to send me the ADVOCATE—pardon me, I am accustomed to "The Old Southern," "The Montana Methodist," if you please.

I am, believe me,
Sincerely your brother
J. HUBERT NOLAND.

Washington Letter.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Mar. 14, '93.

THE GOLD in the Treasury is now four and a half millions. The country has it to spare. In the East little is seen in circulation, but in the West laborers and factory hands are often paid in gold, and the West is offering gold to the Treasury in exchange for small notes. This sounds well and all is well financially if the country produces as much as it consumes, and the public is not stampeded.

FOREIGN debt must be paid in gold. No legislation can compel Europeans to voluntarily accept anything but the yellow metal, and if we do not wish to send them gold we must not buy their goods, nor spend hundreds of millions annually, in traveling over there.

OFFICES and who shall fill them is the topic here now. The new administration is rulling out large groups of candidates though many exceptions to the new rules will probably be made. First, no re-appointments of the 1889 to 1889 incumbents; Second, no appointments of those who can not or will not give their personal attention to the duties of the office; Third, no appointment to office having a definite statutory term and now creditably filled though it be by Republicans; Fourth, no appointment of those who are in an awful hurry; Fifth, few oppointments of editors; the administration has little desire for organs whose praise are neutralized by the political plums they have received; and sixth, fewer appointments of drinkers, for it is said that one of the first questions Cleveland asks is, "does he drink?" It is the question which every shrewd, sensible, successful business man must ask when he looks into the qualifications of those to be put into responsible places. In this connection it is recalled that Cleveland's father when an invalid refused beer prescribed by his physician, because he feared it might be a stumbling block for the weak. Doubtless the son inherits something of the conscientious beliefs of the father.

THE CLEVELANDS have matured sensibly during the last four years. Washingtonians remark that Mrs. Cleveland is more self-possessed and tactful, less ruddy of countenance, more matronly and handsomer than in 1889. And her husband, though he may not be handsomer, is heavier and stands stronger on his supporting columns. He is more masterful and cool. Whether he will overwork as before is not certain, but probably he will work up to his limit whatever it may be. His withdrawel of the Hawaian treaty indicates that he proposes to look into things for himself, and that means work. He ought, however to take more exercise. Let him join a good athletic club, and for three or four hours every day row, run, punch the bag, swing the clubs, or do something to give his muscles fair play and the mind a rest, or if such course is too public, or otherwise inconvenient, let him do as Dr. Lyman Beecher used to Sunday morning before preaching—run down to the basement and shovel over a pile of sand. He certainly should do something beside think on the cares of State and increase in girth.

1896. Already people are talking of the probable Democratic standard bearer four years hence, and it is not unusual to hear Stephenson named as the coming man. His style of politics has ardent admirers, and especially among the straight-out, all wool, yard wide, and warranted not to fade Democrats.

Lesson Text.—Job 5: 17-27.

The Lesson Story.

By Cunnnigham Geikie, D.D., L L.D.

The Book of Job differs in many of its characteristic features, from all the other books of Scripture. Neither the hero nor the subordinate personages introduced are Jews; the scene of the incidents lies outside Palestine. The form of worship described in it is Gentile, not Jewish; for no mention of priests is made,and the father of the household offers the family sacrifices; nor is there in it, from beginning to end, any allusion to Jewish history or Jewish institutions. There is, moreover, an atmosphere of wide humanity in its treatment and spirit unknown to the Jew; and there are frequent allusions to countries outside Palestine,—to the mining region of Sinai, for example, and to the exterminating wars of ancient Edom on the aboriginal Horites, and the varied wonders of the valley of the Nile. Its God is not distinctively the God of Israel; it knows nothing of a chosen people; it has no airs of superiority towards non-Jewish races.

Critics have discussed its age with wonderful acumen, examining its peculiarities of language, and every detail of its style and contents, with the result that now its date, with much confidence, is assigned to some period between the seventh and fifth centuries before Christ; that is, between the time of Manasseh and Nehemiah. The story was probably an old-world tradition of the East, and had been handed down through many generations before it was utilized by the author of the book to enforce great lessons on the moral government of the world by God. The Jews, I may say,speak of it as a mere poem. "Job did not exist," says the Talmud; "he was not a man, but a parable." It is not, however, necessary to think this, and Scripture appears to treat him as a real person. He is painted as one recognized by all as a man of exceptional excellence, and, at the same time, as widely famous for his wealth and worldly prosperity. With all this, his unaffected piety was universally acknowledged. "There was none like him upon the earth,—a perfect and upright man, who feared God and eschewed evil."

According to notions current among the Jews, the temporal good fortune of such a man was secure; but by thoughtful minds this had been felt to be contrary to experience. In accordance with this, Job is,therefore, described in the book that bears his name as visited with every form of trouble, in spite of all his godliness; and the principle is urged, which received its final endorsement by our Saviour, when he asked if the men on whom the tower in Siloam fell were greater sinners than other men, or the Galileans slain by Pilate, when they were sacrificing at the temple, greater sinners than other Galileans,—question which Christ answered in the strongest negative. This life, he in effect taught, is not a system of final rewards and punishments. Here we are disciplined, not paid for our merits or scourged for our faults.

No doubt a second moral is conveyed by the story, in its illustration of the characteristics of a heart loyal to God, when most severely tempted to lose its faith in him. Through all despair and perplexity, the patriarch looks to God as his hope and trust, till, at last the cloud finally breaks, and he rejoices in the full justification of his constancy. Tempted by his wife to turn away from God, he rejects the thought.

Stripped of his children and possessions, and even smitten by a loathsome disease, Job is no longer fit to associate with men, and takes his seat outside the town, on the great dust heap which rises, like a small hill, at the gates of all Eastern villages. It is the haunt of the beggars and homeless of the community, the heat of the fermenting mass giving a sordid comfort through the cold nights. Here he is visited by three friends, who did not know him when they came,so utterly was everything changed. Weeping, rending their mantles, and sprinkling dust on their heads, toward heaven, they sat down, in silent grief, beside him. For seven days and nights they never speak a word to intrude on so great misery.

Then Eliphaz, the eldest and most weighty of his visitors, begins a discourse intended to show that all men are sinful, and that suffering is due to this, but may be removed by sincere repentance. He does not directly accuse the poor sufferer, but recalls the bitterness of the troubles that have overtaken him, and leave him say for himself from what cause they have been sent. Then,to soften the blow, he introduces, through the medium of a vision granted on some occasion to him, the universality of sin, which is found, he declares, not only in man, but in even in higher orders of being. The burden of his address will be more readily caught from the paraphrase of the fourth and fifth chapters, for which I am indebted to a distinguished living writer, and which runs thus:

"My conscience compels me to say something to you. Might I venture to speak without your being vexed? How is it that you,who so often have comforted the distressed, are dismayed as soon as calamity comes upon yourself? Instead of despairing,you should remember that the innocent never perish. It is only the wicked who are consumed.....You need not be ashamed to own your sin, for all of us are sinners. This was revealed once to me in a vision. In the darkness of the night, when deep sleep falls upon men, a fear came upon me and a trembling, a wind swept over my face, and there stood before me a Presence, whose form I could not discern. It spoke in a clear soft voice, and asked, 'Shall mortal man, who is sooner crushed than the moth, be pure in the sight of God his Maker, who chargeth even the angels with folly? It cannot be.' Ask any of the holy ones themselves and they will confirm my doctrine.....

"I have watched the wicked, and always found it ill with them. Their property is enjoyed by robbers. Their children ruin themselves with lawsuits. They themselves pass away prematurely. But this suffering is no accident. It is the punishment of sin. And since all men are sinners, suffering must come, more or less, to all. Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward. Your grief is but an extreme illustration of the common rule.....

"Were I in your place, I would have recourse to God. Forgiveness and happiness may seem more than you can hope for; but God is always doing great things, past finding out. He is continually exalting those that are cast down. Happy is the man whom God correcteth. Despise not his chastening. It is for your good. His purpose is to make you reflect. God only bruises that he may heal. Return to him, and your prosperity will be restored,—nay, increased. In famine he will sustain you. In war he will protect you. You will laugh at all forms of danger. Wild beasts will never hurt you. Even the stones in the field will be in league with you, and, instead of obstructing your crops, will give them a more luxuriant growth. Your children will be multiplied as the very grass of the land. You shall go down to the tomb in a ripe old age, like a shock of corn fully ripe. This, Job, is my experience. Hear it, and learn it, for your good."

Eliphaz illustrates the impossibility of those entering into the deep sorrows of others, who have not themselves passed through similar trials. The heart, says Luther, is the best theologian. The doctrine of e speaker was excellent in its way, and delicately put, but sympathy alone could abate the agony of Job's bosom, and that Eliphaz could not fully give. We are made perfect by suffering, not only in our spiritual life, but in our capacity to succor those over whom the billows of suffering are at the moment breaking.—S. S. Times.

How Our Children Leave Us.

Watch, and within the brief circuit of a year, sometimes even in the course of a few months, you will see a change in the little faces. Take photographs of them, and if you happen to lay them by for a few years, and then open the book, you will have a surprise. You will have something like the following: "Why, I have lost these children. Surely they have gone from me. Has God taken them? No. They are "about" you still. They are beside you now, looking at the pictures, much amused that they should be pictures of themselves. They can see no resemblance to the image they see every day in the glass. So they vanish from us, even when they live, and we see them no more. The little girl with the ringlets is a wayfarer, who is tarrying with you only for a night. She will go on again in the morning toward womanhood. And the sunny boy will keep her company on the way to manhood. Very soon, now, you will see touches of manhood and womanhood on their faces.

Nor can we forget that there are always some who far outstrip the rest —who do not glide away on feet along the earthly ways,but who have wings woven in silence on which they fly up to the fields of heaven. We have spoken of the facial change as children grow to be men and women; but there is another change which sometimes comes on a young face, which betokens a growth quite out of this world, and a putting on of beauty and glory of another. A change this, sad at first to see, sorrowful exceedingly to our earthly affections, yet a change growing more and more fair to look on, a rebuke to our sorrow, a life-long memory to our love.

And so we lose them. And many a Job stands amid the relics of the past, looking back, and plaintively or thankfully recalling the days when the children were about him. Well, but look forward; antedate the time, anticipate the inevitably severance, and work for the formation of the deeper, the immortal, union. If you have wealth—heart property—in these children's children, know it now, for the riches will "make themselves wing and fly away." If you have nurture to give them suitable to their tenderness, preparation for their strength, give it now; in a little while they will be too hard and strong in Nature's growth to take it. If there are lessons which the Master would have you learn of them when you are older, then learn the lessons now, for soon the little faces will be seen no more at the table, the patter of the little feet heard no more in your rooms.—Alexander Raleigh.

A Well Spent Life.

A minister of the gospel was asked to visit a poor, dying woman. The messenger, being ignorant, could give no account of her state, except that she was a very good woman and very happy, and was now at the end of a well spent life, therefore sure of going to heaven. The minister went, saw she was very ill, and after a few kindly inquiries about her bodily condition said: "Well, I understand you are in a peaceful state of mind, depending upon a well-spent life." The dying woman looked hard at him, and said- "Yes, I am in the enjoyment of peace. You are quite right; sweet peace, and that from a well-spent life. But it is the well-spent life of Jesus; not my doings, but his; not my merits, but his blood."—Reformed Church Record.

Here and There.

Rev. W. B. Palmore, business manager and associate editor of the St. Louis "Christian Advocate," has gone on a trip to Africa. His first letter in a recent issue of the "Advocate" is rich and racy. The readers of that paper will enjoy a rich treat from his pen while he is away.

It so happened that in a recent issue of the "Nashville Christian Advocate" there appeared two ably written articles from two of our most distinguished Bishops—Hendrix and Haygood—discussing the "World's Parliament of Religions," question, each taking an opposite view of the subject. In our judgment the California correspondent had the best of the argument.

Mr. Thomas Cook, of Leland, Idaho, and Miss Emma Erickson, of Moscow, Idaho, were united in marriage by Rev. W. S. Hornbuckle, February 28, 1893, somewhere in Idaho, we suppose—the notice received does not locate the event.

By the same postal card that brought the above notice, we also learn that on March 15, 1893, by the same officiating minister, at the residence of the bride's father, Mr. J. W. Winningham, of Vollman, Idaho, and Miss Maggie Rice, of Southwick, Idaho, were united in the bonds of holy wedlock.

Among the new counties organized by the Montana legislature at its recent session, is one called Ravalli, which was cut off the southeren portion of Missoula county, and embraces the greater portion of the famous Bitter Root valley, the line of division running near Lo Lo creek. Stevensville is the county seat until changed by vote of the people.

While we rejoice at the general improvement of the country and the enterprise exhibited by the people in and about the new town of Hamilton, yet we deeply deplore the general desecration of the Sabbath, and other forms of wickedness that are so generally practiced. Much labor is performed on the Lord's day for which there is no earthly excuse. Material development and prosperity that is at the expense of morality cannot meet with God's favor nor will it prove permanent. Let all Christians stand by the Lord's day and observe it properly, and they will prosper in the life that now is and in that which is to come.

Rev. J. E. Squires has been nominated as a member of the proposed "Parliament of Religions," and has signified his willingness to attend, provided said "Parliament" will guarantee all expenses of the trip to Chicago and return and entertainment while there. We are not familiar with the regulations of this so called religious rousement, But we opine that the money will be going the wrong way to secure favorable consideration of our brother's proposition.

Dr. J. E. Godbey, of Kansas City, Mo., has published in the Baltimore "Episcopal Methodist" the ablest article that we have yet seen in favor of the great so-called religious parliament. We have never believed that much real good, to the cause of vital Christianity, will come of the great show.

The meeting at Corvallis is still in progress. There have been 15 accessions and about the same number of conversions to date, and the spiritual life of the community greatly quickened.

The present strength of the Salvation Army in the United States is given as 464 corps, 68 outposts, 1,456 officers, 6 slum-posts, 3 rescue homes, and one food and shelter depot. The Army's paper, the "War Cry," has a circulation of 70,000.

A secular paper publishes a telegram from Topeka, which says that during the intense excitement there over the conflict, between the two rival Houses of Legislature, if the capital of Kansas had been an anti-prohibition city, blood would have flowed like water through its streets. "Had the mobs of armed men who stood in front of the Capitol during those days been able to obtain liquor with which to excite their already wrought up minds, the consequences would have been terrible." This speaks volumes, not only for the value of prohibition, but as to whether or not prohibition is enforced.

We clip the following note from Dr. Palmore's letter giving an account of his visit to Baltimore. We appreciate it more because we visited the same sacred spot, when we were there in 1884:

We also visited here the "City Road" or Westminster Abbey of American Methodism, where on the same lot Bishops Asbury, George, Emory and Waugh are "sleeping under the sod and the dew, awaiting the judgment day." Here too, besides a large number of historic worthies, are the tombs of Collins, Sewell, Jesse Lee and Robert Strawbridge and wife. On Strawbridge's tomb is this significant and very important historic statement: "He built the log meeting house in Frederick, Co., Md., 1764. The first in America. He died in peace in Baltimore county, Md., at Mr. John wheeler's, whither he had gone to preach in 1781." No Methodist ought ever to visit Baltimore without seeing this hallowed, historic spot.

Homely Hints!

A cat will lie around idle all day, but as soon as darkness comes its eyes dilate, and it begins to "rustle." Cat-like human friends lie about indifferently while a man is in the sunshine of prosperity, but let the darkness of adversity set in, and how their evil eyes dilate, and how many faults they discover, and how active they are in their dark work.

The editor of the "Methodist" owns a fine sorrel mare that moves with life, grace and vim, when doing work she likes, but just attempt to ride her when she does not want to go, however necessary it may be, and she will "buck and bawl" like a calf. There are a good many sorrel mares among men, and women, too, as far that matter.

Don't expect too much of the young convert, brother. You, like him, were once "a babe in Christ," and if, now, you do not know anything but to cry and whine and fret about others, will have to believe that you haven't left your babyhood yet. Help the young Christian all you can by prayer, precept, counsel, care, love, sympathy and example. There are some pitfalls in his path that you now know all about. Tell him in a brotherly fashion of them. These "little ones" need all the aid you can give them.

The "Old Richmond" in its late issues has simply been excelling itself in a ride, rare, racy variety of wit, brains and religion- Dr. Lafferty is a wonderful editor. Piercingly pointed, yet powerfully practical are the productions of his pen. His make up is unique—wit, and wisdom chivalrous courtesy and courageous combatitiveness, a heart as tender as a child's, and as loving as a woman's. Paul's piety and John's charity all unite in him. God spare him long. We shall not see his like again.

"Lo, children are a heritage of the Lord"—Thank God for them, but woe unto the parent who through criminal carelessness, conceit or ignorance permits that heritage to be choked and spoiled by weeds of bad language, nettles of impertinence, or nightshades of ill temper.

Where should our children be, if not in the church? We should fervently thank God whenever one of the "little ones" who has just taken a few steps from the fold hears and heeds the Shepherd's first call, and comes back to shelter.

Why are more Christian people sick on Sunday than on any other day? Hath not the "Prince of the power of the air" blown upon them, and blasted their strength—for one day? On Monday they have no trouble in attending to their usual work. Who is deceived? Not God.

This said, there is nothing new under the sun, but surely there are many wonderful things under the sun, for instance it is wonderful that an old maid, or an old bachelor, or a childless married couple know just how children should be trained. The man who never farmed any believes he can beat any farmer of his acquaintance. The man doing something else knows just how to edit a paper. He could do it a thousand times better than the editor. The man who never preaches knows exactly how a sermon ought to be made and delivered, and the preacher who has had least success in revival work, is usually the one who can tell others how best to hold a meeting. The beauties and blisses of pastoral visiting are never so elegantly, and eloquently set forth as by a good brother, who is noted in his community as "a stay at home"—Fifty visits a year would tell all he makes. The above are strange imaginings. The fact is, theory and practice do not always go together, and the doers are not the talkers.

Tom Alton is heavy phyically, but bright, brawny, agile and active otherwise. He only lacks a running-mate to make a matched team of great excellence. A hint to the wise, is sufficient. Tom ought to be wise.

That young Goulder (God bless him) meets another crying need of our western work—more preachers. Stanley, Squires, and Goulder each have a junior in their homes. Home raised preachers are the best. Well done, brethren!

To do God's work with an eye single to God's glory is to stand on a lofty eminence of Christian experience. And to boast of it is to fall by the very act from that eminence. Alas! how many of us have fallen!

Homely Homo.

The River of Difficulty.

Between us and everything bright and beautiful and useful and prosperous there is a river of difficulty that we must cross. "O!" said the Israelites to Joshua, "I wish I could get some of those grapes!" "Well," said Joshua, "why don't you cross over and get them?" The grapes are always on the other side. You have got to cross over to get them. That which costs nothing is worth nothing. God puts everything valuable a little out of our reach, that we may struggle for it. For the same reason he puts gold deep down in the mine, and pearls deep down in the sea, to make us dig and dive. We all understand that in worldly things; would God we understood it in religious things? Nobody is surprised to read that Cornelius Vanderbilt blistered his hands rowing a ferry-boat. Nobody is surprised to hear that A. T. Stewart used to sweep out his own store. You can think of those who had it very hard who have now got it very easy. Their walls blossom and bloom with pictures. Carpets that made foreign looms laugh now kiss their feet. The horses neigh and champ their bits at the doorway, gilded harness tinkles, and the carriage rolls away, like a beautiful wave on New York life. Who is it? It is the boy who once had all his estate slung over his shoulder in a cotton handkerchief. There was a river of difficulty between Benjamin Franklin with a loaf of bread under his arm trudging along the streets of Philadelphia, and Benjamin Franklin the philosopher, outside of Boston, playing kite with a thunderstorm. An indolent man was cured of his indolence by looking out of the window at night into another window, and seeing a man turning off one sheet after another of writing paper until almost he daybreak. Who was it that wrote until the morning? It was Walter Scott. Who was it that looked at him from the opposite window? It was Lockhardt, afterward his illustrous biographer.

It is push and struggle and drive. There are mountains to scale, there are rivers to ford, and there has been struggle for everybody that gained anything for themselves or any thing for the Church, or gained any thing for the world. We all understand it in worldly things; why can we not understand it in religious things? You think it is a mere accident that the old Christian knows so much about the Bible. Why, he was studying his Bible when you were reading your primer. He got strong by running the Christian race. In fifty Solferinos he learned how to fight. In a shipwreck he learned how to swim. It was by pounding at the anvil of trouble he became swarthy. Then when this Christian goes on and gets across all these other rivers of difficulty, there is the river of death still. To some it seems a dreadful river to cross, but here is the Christian coming. His priest, the Lord Jesus Christ, with bruised feet, goes right ahead of him. His breath grows shorter and shorter, and his last breath is gone as he touches the wave. But then all the billows toss their plumes, and begin to sing, "O, death, where is thy sting? O, grave, where is thy victory?"

The time will come when we will cast off these sandals which we must wear because there are so many sharp places on the road of life, and with unsandaled feet we will step on the soft bed of the river. Then with one foot in the bed of the river, with the other we will spring up the bank, and that will be heaven."—The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Looking Upward.

A vast throng of observers gathered recently on Broadway, New York, gazing intently upward. Upon one of the massive buildings that tower far up into the sky workmen were engaged in adjusting the topmost spire At first thir perilous situation attracted the attention of only one passer-by; but very soon a multitude of upturned faces were directed thither. The absorbed gaze of a single individual started a movement, that contained in itself an almost irresistible impulse. Such always is human personality, whenever thoroughly sincere, and profoundly engaged in any direction.

This incident suggests a most valuable lesson in the spiritual world. Let there be but one soul in the community truly and deeply awakened on account of sin—with an absorbed, anxious thought looking away from all sensual things; forgetful even, for the moment, of earthly engagements, so occupied with the supreme magnitude of eternal interests—how soon will other souls be moved in a like manner? Apart from the conviction of sin, which is wrought in the soul by the Holy Spirit, there is a secret momentum in personal example arising from that mental constitution with which God has gifted us. Let one honest, earnest mind lead, and very soon others will follow. Everywhere the Holy Spirit operates in harmony with this law of our nature, using it to bring to pass extensive revivals.

This is equally true in the believing church. Let one soul be thoroughly convinced of the necessity of a clean heart. Let a view of the nature of sin remove spirit and hardness. Let the promise of fullness in Christ kindle holy desires within; the eyes be lifted to the mercy seat in prayer; the mind be lost in the one aspiration to behold Jesus, and in all possible completeness to bear his image. O what a new order of things will speedily take place in the midst. Souls, one after another, will pause by the way, and with all look up; old animosities will disappear; indolence will give place; zeal for service will begin to glow; all the graces of the spirit will flourish in the heart hitherto barren and dead. Behold how much unconscious power one may exert for good, especially when the Holy Spirit has so wrought within, that the outward profession of that one is the unaffected expression of a divine inward life. The song of the ages has been, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." This attitude of the Psalmist has quietly drawn myriads to a similar uplifting of heart. They have caught his spirit. They learn through him their need to look "unto the hills," and confidently exclaim, "We looked unto Him and were lightened, and our faces were not ashamed."

The Deep Meaning.

"I cannot let him go. Why, he might be ill; and among strangers, who would care for him? If he should die away from home, how could I endure it?"

Such were the expressions of a mother who thought she had consecrated her children to the Lord, but who could not consent to the plan for one to go to distant regions to preach the gospel to needy ones. Though himself quite decided on the plan for going, he could not leave his mother while feeling thus, and lingered till at length she gave her consent. But she always spoke of him with a sigh, and with eyes brimful of tears, as of one quite lost from the family; though frequent and loving were the letters sent home from this earnest Christian son.

A little more than half the year—which was the limit of his first absence—had slowly rolled away, and there came a new sorrow to this burdened heart. The eldest of the family, a promising young man in active business in the city, came home from his shop one day saying he did not feel quite well, and would lie down. In answer to his mother's inquiries there appeared nothing alarming about his symptoms, and after a little she left him for duties in another part of the house, but returned to find him a corpse.

Sympathizing friends tried to comfort her, but from the first she said: "It has a deep meaning to me. He was ill and I could do nothing for him. He died at home, but I had not so much as a farewell look! It is to teach me that God can keep or God can take his own. I said with my lips that He might go, but my heart never said so till now. From henceforth he may labor where the Lord calls him."

When the heart feels so strongly at the meaning of God's providence, shall others dispute it? Shall they not, rather, search their own hearts to see if they be in any "wicked way" of withholding what is God's own.—Congregationalist.

Self-Sacrifice.

Self-sacrifice is at the root of the blossoms of goodness that have survived the wreck of paradise. There never was a heart but had gleams of it. Shining at times in some royal natures, diffusive as the light of day without clouds, there is yet no life so dark and clouded but it sends a golden shaft through some opening rift. To be great-hearted, for the love we bear to our Master, and in imitation of him, is the ideal of Christianity, for it is the religion of him whose life and death were self-sacrifice. If we are to follow, we must, like him, bear a cross. It has been so from the beginning. Call the dead-roll of the world's worthies—its prophets, apostles, martyrs, and saints, the great teachers of mankind, the architects of our liberties, the heroes of civilization, the ministering angels who have blessed the poor, the sick, the dying, the helpless—has not the measure of their goodness been that of self denial? They have suffered, that others might suffer less; they have died for the truth, that others might live; they have defended human rights by enduring unspeakable wrongs—the tears and blood. Love, like the fabled bird, pierces his own breast to feed his loved ones. Is not heaven itself to be reached through death? The blessed One entered not into his glory until he had been crucified. The leaders of mankind have had to tread a blackened and scorched path of suffering, and we enter into their labors without their sorrows. White robes of earthly saintship, like those of heaven, are only gained through much tribulation. Every thing good costs self-denial.—J. D. Geikie.

An Easter For the Soul.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER, D. D.

Among all the bright Sabbaths of the round year; the brightest is that which commemorates the most thrilling fact in the history of the human race—Christ's triumph over the power of death and the grave. Easter bells ring from church towers; Easter flowers make the house of God fragrant; and Easter hymns are pitched to the most jubilant key. All this is very beautiful and inspiring; but there are multitudes of people who profess and call themselves Christians who need something more than flowers or songs or Easter sermons. Their daily lives are not very joyous or vigorous; it is a gasping for breath rather than a growth in grace. There is not much bloom or fragrance in their religion. Their spiritual pulse is low; their spiritual joys are about as few and scanty as sunshiny days are in Alaska. The most that they can honestly say for themselves is: "Well, I think that I was converted some time ago; and I am a member of the Church, and I hope that I am a Christian." They are like the conies, "a feeble folk"—with little muscle in their faith, little ring in their devotion, and little power in their influence on those around them. What these people need to have is a genuine Easter for their souls.

1. The Easter message to them is: "If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ is. Set your mind on things above, and not on things of the earth." We seldom get better things than we seek for; and you, my good friends may be grubbing away—like Bunyan's man with his muck-rake—among the straws and rubbish, while there is a crown in the air above you. What you need is first to look higher, and then strive to live higher. Set your mind on something better than merely getting on in the world, and aim at getting up, which is infinitely more important. Adding dollar to dollar in your income, or adding room to room in your dwelling, or round to round in the ladder of social promotion, is not the true mark of the prize for a Christian. There is a loftier realm of spiritual life—of which the risen Christ is the center—that you should strive to rise into. This need not make you a visionary or a sentimentalist, or any less a practical every-day Christian. You may make these every-day duties in your business, in your shop or study, in your home or elsewhere, the stages in your climb upward toward Jesus Christ. Dr. Maclaren has wisely said that "no man is so well able to perform the smallest duties here, or to bear the passing trouble of this world of illusion and change, as he to whom everything on earth is dwarfed by the eternity beyond as a hut is dwarfed beside a palace—and is great because it is like a little window a foot square through which infinite depths of sky with all their stars shine in upon him." So you may make your every-day duties—even the simplest and plainest—to be the rounds in that ladder by which you attain to "the things above."

2. In order to attain this higher and stronger and sweeter and really happier life, you must honestly desire to possess it. Sick and tired of being what you are, you must yearn for something better; and this must voice itself in prayer. Probably you have done but little praying—especially in secret, and what you have done has been from the throat and not from the heart. If you want to be lifted into the warm, pure atmosphere of fellowship with Christ you must use the wings of fervent prayer. Lay hold of the promises of divine strength. There is a prodigious lift in the prayer of faith. When I once kneeled beside Spurgeon at his family altar and heard him pour forth a most wonderful prayer I discovered one of the secrets of his power. He was laying hold of God with what the old Scotch doorkeeper called "close grups." Then, my friend, seek those things that are above, strive in fervent prayer after them; and you may be sure that the risen Christ will manifest himself to you as he did to his disciples in the evening of that Easter Sabbath in Jerusalem.

3. As you look searchingly into your own heart, you will probably find that a great many besetting sins have found house-room there. A cleaning and clearing out is necessary if you would have the Master dwell there. You must make a fresh surrender of your heart to that loving Lord, and that will amount to a reconversion. Peter got such a reconversion, and what a different man it made of him! No more bragging and cowardly skulking now! Peter, after his baptism of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, was as superior to the Peter in Pilate's court yard as an athlete is to a sickly child. He had indeed risen into Christ—into a close and vital and victorious union with his Lord. It was a prodigious lift that hoisted the sleeper in Gethsemane and the coward of Pilate's court up into the heroic thunderer whose single sermon converted three thousand souls. Oh, if this Easter season could see a thorough reconversion and reconsecration of God's people, what a Pentecostal power our churches would attain! What a new liberality in giving and new zeal in working! What a new revelation of the risen Christ to an ungodly world; for assuredly that world will never be converted by men and women who are gasping for life themselves. Even such a soldier of Christ as Charles G. Finney confessed that he sometimes found that his preaching had no power to awaken or convert souls; he seemed to be firing only blank cartridges. When he put himself into close connection with Jesus Christ and sought a fresh baptism, the currents of spiritual power flowed again mighty and irresistible. On a certain morning Dr. Horace Bushnell told his wife that he had had a revelation made to him. When asked what it was, he replied: "The Gospel." He said that the glorious core-truth of the Gospel had broken upon him as an inspiration from Heaven; he had got a spirit-illuminated conception of Jesus Christ. From that time onward he rose from doubts and partial glimpses into a freeness and fullness os communion with God such as he had never enjoyed before.

Something similar to this in kind—though not in full degree—has happened to tens of thousands of Christ's people. They have realized their low estate and begun to "seek the things that are above." Iustead of grieving and thwarting the Holy Spirit, they have prayed to be filled with the Holy Spirit and have sought a fresh baptism. Instead of leaving their Christian lives in the condition of yonder cathedral upon Lafayette avenue—where for twenty years there has been a mere foundation and no edifice on it—they have laid hold of "building themselves up on their holy faith, in the love of God." They have added to their faith, courage, meekness, temperance, patience and the other graces that beautify the Christian. A happy and glorious Easter will this one be to all of us who get a new vision of the risen Christ, and prostrate ourselves in humble adoration at his feet and cry out "Rabboni, Rabboni!" Then shall we set our hearts—lifted into a new atmosphere—on things above and reach an actual higher life. We shall know more of what it is to live by Christ, in Christ, for Christ, and with Christ, till we reach the marvelous light around the throne in glory.—The Independent.

Two Extremes.

I spent much of my time in reading the third volume of Mr. Hervey's "Dialogues." I like his philosophy better than his divinity. However, if he is in danger of leaning too much to imputed righteousness, and in danger of superseding our evangelical works of righteousness, some are also in danger of setting up self-righteousness, and, at least, of a partial neglect of an entire dependence on Jesus Christ. Our duty and salvation lie between these extremes. We should so work as if we were to be saved by the proper merit of our works, and so rely on Jesus Christ, to be saved by his merits and the divine assistance of his Holy Spirit, as if we did no work nor attempted anything which God hath commanded. This is, evidently, the gospel plan of man's salvation: St. Paul says in one place, "By grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God." In another place the same apostle saith, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." But some who see the danger of seeking to be justified by the deeds of the law, turn all their attention to those passages of Scripture which ascribe our salvation to the grace of God; and to avoid the rock which they discover on the right hand, they strike against that which is equally dangerous on the left, by exclaiming against all conditions and doings on the part of man; and so make void the law through faith—as if a beggar could not cross the street and open his hand (at the request of his benefactor) to receive his bounty without a meritous claim to what he is about to receive. What God hath joined together let no man put asunder. And he having joined salvation by grace with repentance, prayer, faith, self-denial, love and obedience, whosoever putteth them assunder will do so at his peril. But it is likewise true that others who see the danger of this, in order, as they imagine, to steer clear of it, go about to establish their own righteousness; and although they profess to ascribe the merit of their salvation to Jesus Christ, yet think they cannot fail of eternal life because the have wrought many good deeds of piety toward God, and of justice and mercy toward man; and they would think it incompatible with divine justice to sentence them to eternal punishment for what they call the foibles of human nature, after having lived so moral and upright a life. Happy the man who so studies the Holy Scriptures, his own heart, and the plan of salvation, and daily prays with such earnest sincerity to Almighty God, as to see that neither faith without works, nor works without the faith which justifies the ungodly, will suffice in the awful day of retribution.—Bishop Francis Asbury.

Our friends, the enemy, seem to be greatly perplexed over the liquor problem. They are opposed to prohibition—that they are, every man of them. Of course, "prohibition does not prohibit." It increases the sales of liquors greatly, and thereby increases the revenues of those engaged in the business, but still they are opposed to it. They do not want too much business, nor do they want to get rich too rapidly. So down with prohibition!

License was to be the remedy—high license. It will cure the evils, and make just the proper amount of business. This was the cry for a time. But now comes the "New York Evening Post" with the declaration that license is a failure, flat and dismal. It says that " there is practically no restriction on the establishing of a liquor store anywhere, or by any one." What? And this under license! Why, license will be as bad as prohibition after awhile! We thought license was the plan which was to stop all illicit sales, and restrict the traffic within safe bounds! And now this idol is dashed and broken! According to their own testimony, license is as great a failure in restricting as they say prohibition is in prohibiting. Our purpose is accomplished when we have pointed out the fact that license as a restrictive measure is a failure, according to the testimony of the friends of the sale of liquors. —Pittsburgh Chr. Advocate.

EDITORIAL.

"THE WAY OUR FATHERS TROD."

It is interesting to every lover of his country to read of the trials, conflicts experienced by our forefathers in securing the noble heritage they have left us. What boyish heart has not thrilled with a deeper and stronger devotion to his country as he read the story of Marion and his men or of the sufferings of Washington and his men at Valley Forge. It is the record of men who loved liberty and country more than fame or fortune. The rehearsal of their achievements helps to foster and keep alive the sentiments that animated them in our own hearts.

But about the same time that this was going on there were men no less brave, self-forgetful or heroic who were fighting battles and making conquests for truth and righteousness that are of equal importance to us. They wrestled not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against spiritual wickedness in high places. It is interesting and helpful to us to know something of their tactics, their manner of life. Hence we copy below from our old discipline (of 1828) the balance of the chapter on house-to-house visitation and on how to combat the evils of the day. Let them be read carefully and prayerfully that we may see whether or not we have departed from the "old paths"—the way our fathers trod:

It is objected, I. This will take up too much time, we shall not have time to follow our studies. "We answer, 1. Gaining knowledge is a good thing, but saving souls is a better. 2. By this very thing you will gain the most excellent knowledge, that of God and eternity. You will have time for gaining other knowledge too. Only sleep not more than you need, and never be idle or triflingly employed. But 4. If you can do but one, let your studies alone. We ought to throw by all the libraries in the world, rather than be guilty of the loss of one soul.

It is objected, II. "The people will not endure it." If some will not others will and the success with them will repay all your labor. Oh, let us therein follow the example of St. Paul. 1. For our general business, serving the Lord with all humility of mind. 2. Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock. 3. Our doctrines. Repentance towards God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ. 4. The place. I have taught you publicly and from house to house. 5. The object and manner of teaching. I ceased not to warn every one night and day, with tears. 6. His innocence and self-denial herein. I have coveted no man's silver or gold. 7. His patience. Neither count I my life dear unto myself. And among all other motives, let these be ever before our eyes: 1. The church of God which he hath purchased with his own blood. 2. Grievous wolves shall enter in; yea, of yourselves shall men arise, speaking perverse things. Write this upon your hearts, and it will do you more good than twenty year's study. Then you will have no time to spare, you will have work enough. Then likewise no preacher will stay with us who is as salt that has lost its savor. For to such, this employment would be mere drudgery. And in order to it, you will have need of all the knowledge you can procure, and grace you can attain.

The sum is, Go into every house in course, and teach every one therein, young and old, to be Christians inwardly and outwardly; make every particular plain to their understanding; fix it in their minds; write it on their hearts. In order to this, there must be line upon line, precept upon precept. What patience, what love, what knowledge is requisite for this! We must needs do this, were it only to avoid idleness. Do we not loiter away many hours in every week? Each try himself: no idleness is consistent with a growth in grace. Nay, without exactness in redeeming time you cannot retain the grace you receive in jutsification.

Ques. 2. Why are we not more holy? Why do we not live in eternity? Walk with God all the day long? Why are we not all devoted to God? Breathing the whole spirit of missionaries?

Ans. Chiefly because we are enthusiasts: looking for the end without using the means. To touch only upon two or three instances: Who of us rises at four, or even at five, when we do not preach? Do we know the obligation and benefit of fasting or abstinence? How often do we practice it? The neglect of this alone is sufficient to account for our feebleness and faintness of spirit. We are continually grieving the Holy Spirit of God by the neglect of a plain duty. Let us amend from this hour.

Ques. 3. How shall we guard against Sabbath breaking, evil speaking, unprofitable conversation, lightness, expensiveness or gayety of apparel, and contracting debts without due care to discharge them?

Ans. 1. Let us preach expressly on each of the heads. 2. Read in every society the sermon on evil speaking. 3. Let the leaders closely examine and exhort every person to put away the accursed thing. 4 Let the preachers warn every society that none who is guilty herein can remain with us. 5. Extirpate buying or selling goods which have not paid the duty laid upon them by government, out of our church. Let none remain with us who will not totally abstain from this evil in every kind and degree. Extirpate bribery, receiving anything directly or indirectly, for voting at any election. Show no respect to persons herein, but expel all that touch the accursed thing. And strongly advise our people to discountenance all treats given by candidates at any elections, and not to be partakers, in any respect of such iniquitous practices.

PAY YOUR FARE.

(Texas Advocate.)

A conductor on one of our passenger trains is also a steward in his Church, and carries round the collection basket at the public services. "It is alleged that on one occasion, passing by a man who did not contribute, the ticket puncher, after urging a contribution, reached up in a fit of absent-mindedness for the bell cord with a view of putting the delinquent off the train. Of course he was confused and the congregation amused, but the incident fails not, nevertheless, to point a moral as well as adorn a tale. There are numbers of so-called Christians —Methodists, too—who are simply dead beating their way on the "gospel train." The State makes them pay their taxes, the "lodges" make them pay their dues, but not being forced to shell out to the support of the gospel, they show how little and mean they are by stealing a ride at the expense of their brethren.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Lady Henry Somerset pays Miss Willard a glowing tribute, from which we extract the following:

That enthusiasm for humanity which characterizes Frances Willard's work was breathed into her active mind by one born and bred in the great free-soil State of the North, whose delight it was to teach her little girl to read from the "Slave's Friend." What wonder that in after years one of the greatest achievements of Frances Willard's life was her mission of reconciliation to the women of the South, while yet the scars of war throbbed in their breasts, and new-made graves stretched wide between sections that had learned the misery of hatred! It was the white ribbon taken by her tender hands that bound those wounds, and gently drew the noble-hearted woman of that sunny land into the hospitable home circle of the W. C. T. U.

How rejoiced we are at receiving the kind words from Brother Berryman written by his own hand. They come as from the border-land of the better world, are backed by a long and useful life consecrated to God, and are inspired by a faith that overcomes the world and a hope that reaches to eternity. We met Father Berryman first at the annual conference at Kansas City in 1867. He was an elderly looking man then, and his presence impressed our boyish heart.

We have felt better acquainted with him since reading of his missionary labors on the Kansas frontier. We intend that he shall have the "Methodist" as long as he desires to read it. May the Lord spare his life to the church for many years yet to come.

——

A brother writes that he has had 17 accessions and lost one by "pettifogging", and adds," their loss is our gain." There is entirely too much of this "pettifogging" or contemptible proselyting in vogue among those who profess to be Christian people and Christian ministers. They come into Methodist homes and use their influence to persuade the children who have been converted at what purported to be" Union" meetings to unite with their particular church. There are certain birds and beasts that live upon the prey that has been taken by others. They are not regarded as very noble. Methodism has furnished converts, taken from" the fields of sin" by thousands, to other communions, but has received comparatively few in return. Her aim is to get people converted to God, not simply to change church homes. We often think of the rebuke our Savior gave to those who compassed sea and land to make one proselyte. Beware of wolves in sheeps clothing.

——

Miss Willard received one of the grandest ovations at Exeter Hall in London that has ever been given to any distinguished man or woman who visited England. There were more than fifty organizations represented, political, religious, 'philanthropic, scientific, —every kind. The immense audience was wild with enthusiasm when she appeared on the platform. She has made a profound impression upon the people across the water, which is no mean compliment to a lady tutored in a western Wisconsin prairie home. Whatever may be said of the peculiar views that she promulgates, she is one of the remarkable characters of the world at this day.

——

A young preacher writes, "I am trying to learn what it is to trust wholly in God. I like your paper very much and have been expressing my appreciation in a tangible way— by getting some new subscriptions, but have been unsuccessful. No money, is the universal cry, and I believe it. But I am not going to down."

Would that more of our young brethren, and older ones too, were trying more persistently to learn this important lesson. We often fear there is not that inward groaning after a higher spiritual life that should characterize men professing to be examples to the flock.

We admire our brother's patience and persistence in working for the paper. If all our friends would do half as well— just try hard— the paper would prosper greatly.

——

Recently a man was shot and killed in a house of bad repute in the new town of Hamilton. As in a great majority of cases, whiskey was assigned as the chief cause. A man keeps a house of shame, deals out deadly poison to his fellow until he loses his self-control and flourishes a weapon, then shoots his inebriated victim, and makes out a case of self-defense, and goes scot free. How long will the people of this enlightened land tolerate a traffic that has such little regard for the value of human life or for the heavy burdens that it imposes upon an unoffending public! It is high time to close these pest-houses of our civilization.

——

The long winter is about over. The flowering buttercups, the fluttering butterflies, and the song of the robin and meadow-lark, tell us that spring is upon us. The mountains are full of snow. Our farmers are busy plowing, and they expect a bountiful harvest this season.

——

By a private letter from Brother Sam. E. Crow, we gather that his labors on Camas Prairie have not been without good results. He has been appointed by the presiding elder to take the place of Brother Robertson at Genesee. May the Lord go up with him to his new field and give him great success.

——

A meeting was conducted in the Disciple church at Corvallis by Elder Cook, of Corvallis, and Gormley, of Bozeman, for several weeks. There were a number of immersions, and several accessions by renewal, or certificate. Our brethren have constructed a baptismal pool in the church, but as there is not much water there, as there was "in Enon, beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing," and it has to be filled and warmed, by artificial means, some of the converts prefer the clear, sparkling waters of Bitter Root river, in which to be immersed for the remission of sins. We admire their courage and their consistency, and if we were in their place we would carry it further by insisting that the officiating minister dispense with a rubber suit upon such occasions.

——

We expected in this issue to give an account of the meeting and opening exercises of the District Conference at Deer Lodge, but a delayed train, caused by a landslide in the Coeur'd Alenes, prevented our arrival there in time, leaving us at Garrison Junction, only ten miles distant, where these lines are penned and placed in the mail car on the Northern Pacific Line. Next week we will give a full account of the conference.

——

There is upon our table a copy of a circular letter sent out by Miss Horde, the efficient superintendent of public schools in Missoula County, urging upon the trustees and other school officers the importance of better and closer organization in order to do more efficient work. What is true of the officers of the public school is also true of the members of the church of God. There must be organization, and prompt and earnest and united action, if we would be successful in bringing men from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God.

——o——

Work While 'Tis Day.

There is no point in this life where we can safely cease our spiritual activity and retire. In secular business men frequently accumulate enough of wealth to cease operations and thereafter live on their capital. This cannot be done in the labor we carry on for God. No man can say: "I have now finished my course, have reached the point of perfection, and have nothing to do but to lounge around awaiting for the final settlement." That is the spirit that led the servant with one talent to wrap it in a napkin and bury it. David seemed to have a correct idea of the the desire that should animate us in our Christian life when he said: "I shall be satisfied when I awake in Thy likeness."

I do not know of a congregation that has a right to stop its work in the vineyard of the Master. This body of people demand, and that justly, that we excuse them from further toil. When I tell you who they are you will admit their claim and say we must not expect anything of them. Do you wonder where they are? I will tell you. Some fine morning when you are in a humor for a walk, just wend your way to a place dotted with oblong-shaped mounds decorated with flowers. It is strangely silent. Beautiful stones with their chisel-carved inscriptions meet your eye. Over the entrance to its pebbled walks you read the name of the place where this inactive congregation worship. It is spelt like this, "Cemetery." Some day we shall join those people. Until we do we have no right to cease in our efforts for upbuilding the kingdom of Christ. This is work, real, earnest work, and God expects us to do our share of it.—Christian Gleaner.

Opportunity and Character.

BY GEO. D. HERRON, D. D.

It is not opportunity and the lack of opportunity, not ability and the lack of ability, that make the difference in the power of human lives for good. It is faith and the lack of faith, character and the lack of character. It is consecration and concentration, and the failure to consecrate and concentrate. It is courage and self-denial over against cowardice and selfishness.

There is a potential hero of faith, a possible prophet of larger truth, in every soul. The door of supreme opportunity swings open to every man and woman, church and nation. In some great moment God stands before each and says: "Now is thy time! Show what is in thee! Show the world thy vision or thy blindness!" And what makes one great and the other small is that one grasps what the other passes by. One enters the door of opportunity which the other fails to enter because of the cowardice of unbelief. One looks at himself and fails; while the other looks God and His universe in the face and dares to trust, trust in spite of the stupidity of the church, the mockery and unbelief of the world, the misunderstanding of friends.

Harlan Page, pressed with business cares, battling with ill health, led a hundred young men into the ministry by consecrating his personal influence to Christ; yet every business man in New York had the same Christ and the same opportunity. John Wesley became the apostle of a new dispensation of divine grace to the world; yet every student in Oxford had the same opportunity to gather about him a half dozen fellow students for prayer and Scripture study and divine guidance. The noble daughter of William E. Dodge has consecrated herself and wealth and time to solving the problem of the poor in New York city; yet many rich men's daughters have the same opportunity. George Muller, beginning in poverty, has built up those orphan homes in Bristol, England, which are a miracle of prayer the unbelief of the world cannot gainsay; yet there were other students in the German university where he studied upon whom the same spirit of prayer was pressing. Time would fail me to tell of the many who through faith have seen the purposes of God in their day, which the pride and unbelief of the world would not see, and have made them their opportunity.

It therefore behooves us each to be about our Father's business, watchful for our opportunities; for the night cometh in which no man can work. In an hour when we think not the Son of Man may come to us, in the supreme moment of our life, and find us sleeping on the threshold of a matchless opportunity. It is God's part to estimate the value of our service; it is our part to serve and question not.—The Advance.

JOB'S APPEAL TO GOD.

Lesson Text.—Job 23: 1-10.

The Lesson Story.

By Cunningham Geikie, D.D., L L.D.

When Eliphaz had ended his appeal to Job, the poor sufferer broke his silence, and began a formal reply, which extends through the sixth and seventh chapters. He had been sorely vexed, he said; but his vexation had been as nothing compared to his calamity, which was heavier than the sands of the sea. The poisoned arrows of God were drinking up his life. But he had reason for his grief, for not even a beast cries out without cause. To tell him of death as awaiting him if he did not repent was idle, for he longed for it above all things. Then he would have comfort, for he had never disobeyed the words of the Holy One. To talk of a happy future if he confessed, was vain. He had not the strength of stone and brass; his life was broken.

Even the support he might justly claim from his friends was withheld. They had been like winter-torrents, which run deep when not needed, but have dry beds in the time of heat. He had asked nothing, but looked assuredly for sympathy. Let them show him, in plain words, what he had done wrong. They accused him, but gave no proof of their charges. As to his passionate words, no one could lay stress on them; for words were but wind, and despair like his could not restrain its cries.

In spite of them, he asserted his innocence. He knew right from wrong, and spoke thus from his heart. They had painted God as a Father, but his experience was bitter. Like a slave under a taskmaster, panting for the night, man longed for death to end his misery. His own life was now unendurable in its wretchedness, and was hastening swiftly to its close, when he would pass into nothingness, like a cloud before the sun. Why should God torture so feeble a creature thus? Why should he keep watch over him every moment, to try him with fresh plagues? Grant that he had sinned; what harm could he do to God? Why cannot so great a being pardon so frail a worm, who is so soon to mingle with the dust?

Bildad now begins, bluntly enough, with harsh reproof. When would Job give up his storm of angry words? Was God ever unjust? Would He have killed Job's children if they had not been sinners? They must have perished for their wickedness. As for Job himself, penitence would bring back prosperity. The fathers had rightly held that a hypocrite can no more prosper than a rush can grow without water. His ground of hope is frail as a spider's web. But if he turned to God, his sorrow would be changed to joy.

In chapters ix and x, Job speaks again. Admitting the omnipotence of God and the hopelessness of contending with him, he yet asserts that innocence makes no difference in the fate of men. God destroys alike the perfect and the wicked. He himself is assumed by his friends to be guilty, but he is not. Yet it would only make things worse if he tried to reason with the Almighty. He does not care whether he lives or dies. He will speak out, and ask God why he thus contends with him. Is it right to oppress the weak and to favor the wicked? Innocence and sin are treated alike. Would he had never been born! Oh that God would let him alone, that he may have a little peace before he goes to the land from which there is no return,—the land of thick darkness!

Zophar now comes forward, simply repeating that prosperity or suffering are meted out exactly in proportion to a man's innocence or sin. Job replies by a lengthened exaltation of the awful power of God, but he shows how far, in his opinion, the divine government is from being strictly retributive; that, in fact, it is either capricious and arbitrary, or beyond our comprehension. He will demand a formal trial, and claims to know of what he is accused. Receiving no answer he sinks into his former sadness. Yet, for a moment, he has now the nope of a future life, but presently passes to his old despair, and sees in death only the end of cosncious existence.

Eliphaz now again (Job xv.) appears,—only, however, to repeat his former doctrine of exact rewards and punishments in this life. Job hardly deigns to reply, but turns to God in mingled complaint and entreaty illuminated by gleams of hope. Yet he closes by hailing death as his one great desire. Bildad now reappears, urging the orthodox idea of the time once more, with keen minuteness of home thrusts at the sufferer. Yes, punishment of sin is the explanation of all we endure in this life.

But Job will not admit that it is so. His miseries, he persists, are not a punishment for sin, though he does not pretend to know how their infliction can be reconciled with the justice af the Almighty. Can his friends not show pity on him, and mitigate his wretchedness by a little human tenderness? But they remain silent, afraid to be sympathetic, lest it should appear as if they condoned his supposed heterodoxy. Deserted thus, his misery sinks still more deeply into his heart. It was clear that no light to cheer his deep gloom could be expected from any earthly source. Was it possible that, after all, the balance of his destiny would be restored hereafter, by a future life? Till now he had regarded death as the close of man's being; but how could it be so, since in no other way, apparently, than by the redressing of his miseries in a life to come, could the justice of God be vindicated?

Sitting on the dust-heap in unspeakable sorrow, he sees his friends wrapped in soothing self-complacency at their own prosperity, as proof that they were so much better than he as not to have needed the infliction of his sufferings. Yet he feels that their lives certainly had not been better than his own. How could this be explained, unless there was a future life, in which that which was so mysterious now would be vindicated, and the justice of the Eternal be made clear? From this time his faith in his immortality is fixed. "I should wish," says he, that what I am about to speak were graven on the rocks, that it might be read forever. I know that there lives for me an Avenger, and that by and by he will stand over my grave, and pronounce my cause just. My body shall be destroyed, but without it, I shall see God. Yes, I myself shall see him. As for you, O friends! if you persist in persecuting me, beware of the sword of my Avenger, my Vindicator."

Zophar now takes up the discourse, hurling still more bitter reproaches upon Job for his obstinate heterodoxy. But the patriarch stubbornly maintains that he is innocent, and clings to his faith in a future vindication more tenaciously than ever. He will live beyond the grave, and there all will be put right.

Eliphaz once more retorts fiercely. But it is of no use. Job holds fast to his trust in the final justification of divine justice in the life beyond. "Even to day," says he, after all your hard speeches, I persist in my complaint; yet, bitterly though I groan, it does not express the depth of my grief. Oh, that I knew where I might find God! I would go even to his throne, and lay my cause before him, and advance argument on argument, that I might hear what he should say in reply. Then, at last, I should understand what he has to urge against me. I am not afraid of his using his great power to put me down. No; let him but himself attend to my case, and not confuse it with your blind talk. Then would there be a righteous man disputing with him, and I should be delivered forever by my Judge, and fully acquitted. The trouble is I know not where to find him. If I go east, he is not there; if I go west, I cannot perceive him; if I go to the north, where he is working, I cannot behold him; if I go south he hides himself, so that I cannot see him. But he knows my life. My foot has walked in his ways. I have kept to them, and not turned aside. I have obeyed his commands. I have set his will before my own. When he does put me to trial, I shall come forth as gold. Meanwhile his purpose must be carried out. I must wait his time. What he wills he always performs. The thought of this overcomes me, but I trust in him, and the end will declare my innocence and vindicate all his ways."—S. S. Times.

She Gave up the Theatre.

A woman came to me in one of my meetings and said to me:

"Mr. Moody, I want to be a Christian, but—I will be frank with you—I don't want to be one of your sort."

"Have I any peculiar sort of Christianity?" I asked.

"Well," she said, "I want to be a Christian, but I can't give up the theater."

"Have you heard me say anything about the theater? I have been preaching here four weeks, and my sermons have been fully reported in the papers. Have you read anything in any of them about the theater? I have noticed you in the audience almost every day, have you heard me say anything about the theater?"

"No," she said, "I have not."

Well, then, what do you bring that up for?"

"Why," she answered, "do you go to the theater?"

"No; I have got something better."

"Well," she said, "when I heard you talk about the character of Christ the other day, I thought it was so lovely, and I thought I would like to become a follower of his, but I can't give up the theater!"

"Why do you bring that up again? Did I say anything about the theater?" No; but do you think I can be a Christian and go to the theater?

"If you will give Christ the first place in your heart, you can go to the theater if you want to."

"O, I am so glad to hear that! I am glad you are not one of those narrow Christians that think a person must not go to the theater if he is a Christian."

"Well," I said, "let's kneel down here and pray."

When we arose from our knees she said: "I believe I have found the peace of God, but I can't give up the theater."

"If you give Christ the first place in your heart you can go to the theater if you want to. Of course, you will only want to do what pleases him?"

You love your husband don't you, and do things to please him?

"Yes."

"Well, give Christ the first place in your heart, and do what pleases him. If you can glorify him by going to the theater, why go."

She went away. In ten days she came back and said: "Mr. Moody I understand you now. We had a crowd of people at our house the other night, and my husband proposed that we go to the theater, and we went. As soon as the curtain went up, it all seemed different. I wanted to get out of the place at once, and told my husband so. 'Don't go,' he said. 'Everybody will say you are a fool. They are saying you are a fool now, because you went to the Moody meetings and got converted.' 'I have been a fool all my life,' I replied, 'and I am going at once,' and I left."—Ram's Horn.

How the Battle is Going.

FROM LELAND, IDAHO.

Dear Bro. Stanley:

I send you one more subscriber and more to follow. Your paper, or, our paper, is growing more popular with the people. Some of them would like to see the Editor.

Thus far we have had a successful year. It never has been my privilege to serve a better people. They are both kind and generous, ready for every good word and work. We have organized an Epworth League and a Parsonage Aid Society.

W. S. Hornbuckle.

FROM BRO. BERRYMAN.

Caledonia, Mo. March 17th '93.

Dear Brother:—

You must excuse my writing with a pencil, because my hand is too unsteady to use a pen, and my sight also has become quite dim.

I have been reading the "Montana Methodist" more than two years, and it has always been a welcome visitor. It is unqualifiedly a good paper, and doubtless is accomplishing much good. May it and its editor live long and prosper.

Two months ago I completed the eighty-third year of my life and the sixty-fifth of my ministry as a Methodist preacher, and my heart goes out to God in love and praise because he has thus dealt with me, for I would rather belong to such a brotherhood than wear the most brilliant crown that ever ornamented the head of any king or potentate.

Your Brother
Jerome C. Berryman.

FROM STEVENSVILLE.

Stevensville, Mont., Mar. 24th, '93.

Editor Methodist:—

The protracted meetings for Stevensville and Corvallis charge are over for the present. There were nearly fifty conversions, and about forty additions. Brothers Shaeffer, Alton, Stanley, Squires and my father rendered efficient help. To God be the glory.

W. O. Waggener.

FROM CRESTON, WASH.

Mrs. Maggie Gobbart writes from Creston, Wash., renewing her subscription to the "Methodist," and says:

"We got Brother St Clair to send for the paper. He was our pastor at the time, whom we shall never forget. He was the means of bringing us to Christ, and made our house a house of prayer and, praise the Lord, many others were brought to Christ by him. He organized our Sunday school, and will long be remembered. God bless him and his companion in their new sunny home. We get the Montana Methodist regularly, and we enjoy reading it every week. We will remit again in October."

BUTTE NOTES.

Mr. Editor:—

We have been having lively times in the great "mining camp." The "boycott" is on. This time the Labor Unions say, "the Chinamen must go." But the great trouble seems to be that workingmen still persist in patronizing "John," and, though threatened with publication, will not give him up. Many hard things are said about the Celestials. How many are true the present writer cannot say. It is true that the Chinamen are keepers of "Opium-joints" and Gambling-houses, which are degrading and damnable in their influence: but there are others in this city whose influence for bad is more far-reaching. Major Camp, in one of his evening sermons, advises the "boycotters," while they are in the business, to include, with the Chinamen, al the Saloons and Gambling-houses.

Butte has a flourishing trade in whiskey. The grave-diggers, too, do a pretty good business. Are the two in anyway connected?

But church news is what you asked me to write. And that is just why I have not written sooner. It is pretty hard, to say something when you have nothing to say. Church news is hard to pick up in "these diggins."

A great many people who were considered "pious" in the east, have come out here carrying their church letters with them, but leaving God on the other side of the Rockies. They keep their letters in their trunks. The next thing you hear about them is that they have become back-sliders after the most approved fashion.

Say! the Devil is in this town just as he was in that poor Demoniac of Gadara, and his "name is legion." He creeps into the church and captures a preacher and persuades him to say there is no harm in playing cards and dancing. Then a whole drove of soft heads quote that preacher to ease their consciences while they indulge in these "harmless amusements," thereby throwing off all restraint and taking the first steps towards complete alienation from the church. Worldliness in the church is the one great obstacle in the way of a genuine, old--fashioned, heart-stirring, soul-saving revival in Butte. When will the time come when we can lay aside all foolishness of the character mentioned and rally to our God given work of saving the lost?

Our church is doing tolerably well. Congregations are very good. The Epworth League gives promise of being a help to the pastor in many ways. The prayer-meeting— the spiritual gauge of the church—is very well attended. But, Mr. Editor, we need a better church building in Butte. When we have that we can take the place we ought to occupy. There is no prejudice against us because of our "suffix" that the pastor ever hears about. The impression is out that Southern Methodism is come to stay. "So mote it be."

Brother Glasgow, who was recently granted a local preacher's license, came this way and tarried two or three days with the "bachelors." He is very pleasant and we enjoyed his company very much.

McLaughlin has become a preacher too. Two new men our stirring Presiding Elder will probably bring up to conference for admission on trial. He says he must find preachers out here or "grow them." John Edwin is now being carefully trained for that mission. We need just that sort of P. E's.

Good news comes from all the brethren. But this is too long. Must quit right short. Promise not to do it again.

Yours etc.
Tom W. Alton.

HOME AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

There's no reason why one should be deterred from visiting the World's Fair by reason of possible inconvenience and uncertainty attending the securing of satisfactory hotel accommodations.

The Northern Pacific Railroad will in due time publish low excursion rates to Chicago and return for this occasion, while its double daily passenger train service, including through sleeping cars of both classes (Standard and Tourist) to Chicago, will as usual be at the head of the list in every particular.

To help you in fixing in advance upon your place of residence while attending the World's Fair, we have placed in the hands of our agent at your station a book compiled by perfectly trustworthy parties, called "Homes for Visitors to the World's Fair." This little book, which you can purchase for fifty cents, contains a list of about 9,000 private families who will accommodate visitors during the time of the Fair, viz: May 1st to Oct. 30th; gives their names and addresses, and number of rooms each will have to spare. The book also gives a list of the hotels and their locations; has twelve full-page large-scale maps, each representing a section of the city, so that with this information before him the intending visitor himself can, at leisure, select the quarter of the city in which he would prefer to stop, corresponding in advance with one or more families in that locality with regard to rates and the accommodations desired.

CHRISTIAN UNITY.

We do not believe that the time will ever come when all denominational distinctions will be abolished, and the vast army of Christ's followers will be gathered into one compact host, moving with the precise and measured tread of disciplined soldiers. Nor do we pray for any issue of that kind. One of the most precious things in this world is liberty, and where there is liberty there will always be more or less of diversity. The great denominations stand each for some special mode of activity. Let them stand. Even the smaller bodies have their uses. At any rate, it is for them to determine whether they are ready to be swallowed up in more potent and comprehensive organizations. Any plan to force them into alliances which they cannot conscientiously endorse, is utterly unchristian; and this is just as true when the plan employs the peaceful means of undue moral pressure as when it uses the bloody instruments of war.

In the meantime, let all the denominations cease to vex and disturb one another. There is work enough for them all to do. Why should they wish to fight anybody except Satan and his emissaries? Let them be friends and not foes, allies and not antagonists. Following this policy, they will speedily discover that the points in respect to which they differ are as dust in the balance when compared with the points in respect to which they agree. Gradually those of them that are closest together will melt into visible, organic unity. As naturally as the ripe fruit drops from the trees, the useless divisions will be obliterated, and the number of sects will be reduced until only those are left that represent something really vital and essenial.

These things cannot be done by any sort of subjugation. If accomplished at all, they must be the result of the normal processes of which we have just spoken. The measuers that are often suggested to precipitate the desired ends serve only to postpone their consummation. The great thing is that we learn to respect and love one another— and to live and let live. There is a considerable remnant of the spirit of Popery yet left in the heart of the Protestant Churches—the spirit that clamors for a uniformity patterned after its own notions. It cannot be exercised by any human incantations, but must be expelled by the Spirit of God. "This kind goeth not out by fasting and prayer."

Valley of Despair.

It may be that these lines will come to the eyes of one who is in sorrow, or who is discouraged, or who is bending beneath a cross; one who is working out her youth and vigor for bread; who, perhaps, has others depending upon her; one who is reaping, it may be, as she thoughtlessly sowed; one who is weeping a fault or bitterly repenting a sin. And if there be any such, I send to her a message. Keep away from the path that leads down to the valley of despair! Do not let your feet pass into it once; do not let your eyes turn toward it; do not hear its voices that call to you; do not see its hands that beckon. For when you once start down that path, it is so hard, so difficult, to come back again. It is so steep, and before you are aware, you are slipping farther and farther down. And if you go on, one day you will come to the valley itself, and when you stand on its threshold and look in, you will see only lost prayers and wasted tears and the wrecks of fair ideals; worn-out hopes and toil unrewarded and duties neglected; and you will hear weary sobs and sighs that are only ghosts. And, alas! you will find that it is too late for turning back, and you will pass in forever and ever. So, discouraged heart, keep out of that path. Take up your burden and bear it—perhaps your own hands laid it upon you. Others are all about you who are heavily laden, and by and by, if you bear it bravely, and uncomplainingly, you will find it growing lighter. Whatever comes, be brave and cheerful, and whether you deserve the punishment or do not deserve it, some day it will be taken away.

Tired heart, tired heart,
Locked in cruel bars;
Take this message ere we part—
Keep your eyes on the stars!

Look to the future, strong and bright,
And keep out of the past;
For the longest day and the blackest night,
Will wear away at last.

The Indian's Scale of Giving.

One day an Indian asked Bishop Whipple to give him two one dollar bills for a two dollar note. The bishop asked, "Why?" He said, "One dollar for me to give to Jesus, and one dollar for my wife to give." The bishop asked him if it was all the money he had. He said, "Yes." The bishop was about to tell him it was too much, when an Indian clergyman who was standing by whispered: "It might be too much for a white man to give, but not too much for an Indian who has this year heard for the first time of the love of Jesus."

Invite good thoughts and welcome them when they come. They are visitors that will leave a blessing behind them when they have departed.

A Definition Applied.

In a recent number of the "Christian Union" Dr. Lyman Abbott writes of the late Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Sr. This incident carries a lesson that certain public speakers and Sunday school superintendents should learn:

Dr. Tyng's intensity of spiritual life was accompanied by a natural impetuosity of temperament. One element of his power was the impression he produced upon his audience of strong passion kept under control. Occasionally the passion got the better of the will, but so thorough was his consecration, so genuine and unaffected his humility, that he turned these occasions of seeming defeat into victories. One authentic incident is narrated: He was speaking in his Sunday school one Sunday afternoon. He told the children that in all of us there is an animal nature.

"The liar," he said, "is a serpent who creeps in sinuous ways to strike with his fangs and poison with his virus. The frivolous boy is a monkey, giving himself up to antics and grimaces. The vain child is a peacock, spreading himself to be admired by others. The angry child is a tiger, passionate and untamed."

Then he gave out a hymn. The children did not make ready promptly, and began to sing in confusion and disorder. Instantly his face flushed. He rapped sharply on the desk and gave vent to some exclamation of impatience. A little girl in the rear of the room, one who had been swept into forgetfulness of self by the vehemence of the preacher's eloquence, pointed her finger at him and called out in a childish voice, but loud enough to be heard all over the room, "Tiger." Instantly a hush fell upon the room. Dr. Tyng laid down his book, walked down the aisle, took the little girl, shrinking and frightend, in his arms, quieted her fears with his benign smile, walked back to the platform, and caressing her, said to the children:

"Yes, she has told the truth. My enemy all my life has been the tiger in me. I have hard battles to keep him caged. Every now and then he breaks loose in spite of me; and it is because I have had such a hard battle that I want you children to tame the tiger that is in you while you are young."

No child that was present will ever orget the lesson of that incident, and no man of less consecrated spirit could possibly have made this childish rebuke such a means of ministry.

An Example of Perseverance.

It is truly astonishing how difficulties will vanish before a determined and resolute will. A shining example of this is the career of Geza Zichy, the Hungarian one-armed pianist.

Zichy was a born musician, and from earliest years quite a violinist. In his twelfth year his father engaged a piano instructor for him, who at the outset prophesied failure, inasmuch as Zichy's left arm was weak and, as the instructor claimed, incapable of development. He, however, gave the desired instruction, when, lo, one day Zichy was brought home from the chase with his right arm so mangled that amputation was necessary, and the strong joyful lad of yesterday became weak and melancholy. While in this condition he called for pen, ink, and paper, and using his left arm as best he could, scribbled a few lines, folded the paper, and handed it to his father with strict orders not to open the same for one year. From that moment on, a wonderful change came over him. He banished melancholy; learned to ride like an expert, and practiced gymnastics as only an athlete could, and marksmanship as only an Indian could. But the most wonderful feats he performed upon the piano. Such playing had never been heard. Liszt, the king of pianists, listened to his peformance, and at its close, standing on tip toes, kissed his forehead, at the same time remarking:

"You will have no imitators."

Leaps of six and eight octaves were but child's play to him. More than all his playing was soulful and expressive. He played before royalty everywhere, always astonishing, charming, and bewildering. In every large city in Europe he appeared, always performing for the benefit of the poor and oppressed.

He could carve a turkey with consummate skill; and his pared apples were preserved as relics, so perfectly was the operation performed.

At the end of one year the note referred to above was opened and contained this statement: "Within one year's time I will accomplish more with one hand than others accomplish with two." And he did!

Edith's Faith.

"Wide Awake," always on the lookout for some new sayings of precocious children, tells this story:

Little Edith, not quite two years old, was a precocious little talker, and was, in her grandmamma's eyes, "a very daring child." But once grandmamma's fears were entirely disarmed and put to rout by the little one's unconscious faith. Grandmamma happened to reach the foot of the stairs as Edith, unattended, was nearing the top.

"Edith, you will fall—you will certainly fall!" she called.

Stopping a moment and looking solemnly down at grandmamma, the child announced:

"No, I won't; I prays my Lord my soul to keep."

"Well, then you won't," says grandmamma. "But go on."

Love is the lever power with which to lift this world to God. Love to the soul is like sunshine to the plant, it produces life, health and vigorous growth.

A Morning Prayer.

MRS. E. A. HAWKINS.

Strength for the day I humbly ask,
Faith in the coming morrow,
But not one drop of weal or woe
From future days to borrow.
I'll trust the hand that measures out
My cup of joy or sorrow.

Strength for the fight I this day wage,
The victor's crown to wear it;
When wounded in the desperate fray,
Courage I ask to bear it.
And Thou, dear Lord, to walk beside,
My day's march home to share it,

And when the day is past and gone,
My grateful heart upswelling,
A hymn of praise shall joyful raise,
Thy love and goodness telling.
I'll waft it up beyond the stars
Where all my hopes are dwelling.

And when the last hard fight is done,
And death comes to relieve me,
Let not the hope which cheers me now
With mocking gleam deceive me:
But to Thyself, dear Lord, I pray
For Jesus' sake, receive me!

THE WORD OF GOD.

Whatever may be our pursuits in life, our stability and success greatly depend upon an immutable purpose to please God. This purpose must grow out of knowledge and faith. This can only be gained by the study of the Word of God. This study involves almost all knowledge, but the unlettered man may learn much out of his Saxon Bible, God's own Book, in his mother tongue.

The young man who feels called of God to preach the gospel should place the mark of his attainments high, and,whatever betide, should be "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

The preacher for these times, or any other times, should be just as good a scholar as possible, by the utmost diligence, in using all the means placed within his reach. A clerical ignoramus and drone is a lamentable humbug,and an uncalled, unqualified messenger. Many think that they may be intelligent and yet uot study the Bible.Such intelligence will not be as creditable to your head or heart as though it was accompanied by a familiarity with the Word of God. Read,study,commit to memory and ponder daily these wonderful thoughts, until they are interwoven with all your thinking, until, like golden chains, they bind your affection and your soul to God. These thoughts are the thoughts of the angels—great, precious, thrilling God-thoughts. Your literary tastes, as well as your religious principles, depend very much on your acquaintance with the Bible. The greatest of poets, orators, statesmen and philosophers have acknowledged their indebtedness to the sacred Scriptures, and its revilers have not scrupled to plagiarise from its sacred pages.

Atheism has two corner stones; to wit, ignorance and wickedness. If any are so unfortunate as to build character on these foundation stones they will be very likely to find themselves disappointed and unhappy. Their wisdom will never be apparent to any except themselves. They will have great difficulty in maintaining opinions which all nations, civilized and savage, have pronounced absurd.

We are not among the worshipers of Daniel Webster. We do not hesitate to condemn some acts in his life, some traits of his character; yet we would not so far stultify ourselves as to deny his greatness nor his general honesty of purpose. The epitaph on his tomb is the production of his own mind. It is the solemn conclusion of a great, human intellect,after examining all systems and testing fully all sources of enjoyment. Here it is; ponder it well.—

DANIEL WEBSTER.
Born January 18, 1782.
Died October 24, 1852.
"Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief."

Philosophical argument,especially that drawn from the vastness of the Universe, in comparison with the apparent insignificance of this globe, has sometimes shaken my reason for the faith which is in me; but my heart has always assured and reassured me that the religion of Jesus Christ must be a divine reality. The Sermon on the Mount cannot be a merely human production. This belief enters into the very depth of my conscience. The whole history of man proves it.—DANIEL WEBSTER.

Place the Bible first, always. It needs to be read and studied by every Christian, every man. It should be perused daily during our whole life, and then it will become dearer every day. Its glorious songs are full of humanity, hope, piety. They breathe into our souls the peace of heaven. they have been sung by the church three thousand years, and to-day their influence is greater than ever before. It shall never be less, but shall widen and deepen until "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

Cleansed as She Went.

Mr. B. Fay Mills tells an interesting story of a young lady's conversion. One of the commonest obstacles to successful seeking is the lack of a brave and earnest purpose:

"A young lady was deeply concerned about her spiritual interests, and, after a severe struggle, started to visit her pastor, to ask him to show her the way of life. As she entered a horse-car in carrying out her purpose, she saw seated there several of her friends, who asked her where she was going. The tempter immediately said: 'Don't tell them where you are going, but answer them in some evasive way.' At the same time the Spirit whispered to her: 'Be brave and conscientious about this. Tell them of your purpose and ask them to go with you.' She obeyed the latter voice. Her friends declined to accompany her, and she went on alone. When she came to the minister's house, he came to the door to meet her. She paused from embarrassment for an instant, and then said: "Doctor, I started to come to see you to ask you to lead me to Christ; but now that I am here, I have come to tell you I have found Christ.' As she went she was cleansed."

Saving Faith.

It is clear that the gift may be free, and yet God may have chosen a special method of bestowing it. There may be something in that method repulsive, or humiliating, or perplexing to the mind, and yet God has a right to demand that we take his gift, not only as his gift, but as coming through these particular circumstances and instrumentalities. If it has pleased God to grant us salvation by the death of Christ as an atonement, we cannot leave out of sight this great fact, and say we will take the mercy direct from God, without reference to the views or expedients which have weight upon his mind. We must take it as it really is—as God's mercy shown to us in view of that sacrificial death. We must trust in God's mercy, through Christ.

It is not demanded that a penitent be able to solve all the deep problems which hang around the atonement. He may trust God's word that the sufferings of Jesus are held as the substitute or equivalent for the penalties he merited, and yet he may not fathom the mystery, how God finds in them a reason and a means, without which he could not pardon. The unlettered orphan-boy, ignorant and slow of comprehension, may take the check handed him by the benefactor, and hearing that, in view of and for the sake of that check, his plea will be heard by a banker, may never think or never know just how this banker is persuaded to give the money, or how he is compensated; but that poor boy may ask and receive the amount, not in view of his own claim, and not in view of any personal good will alone of the banker toward his benefactor, but in view of that same check. So may a poor penitent soul feel that it is enough if God knows, as perhaps he alone knows fully, the compensations and the bearings of that atonement. It is enough that we never come to ask God's blessings but through that medium, trusting, see we more or less clearly, in the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world. We dare present no prayer to God which Christ has not indorsed—and indorsed in his own blood and suffering.

Now, this reliance, this resting on God's promise for Jesus' sake, is what is called the act of faith; an act, we say, because it involves a special effort of the will. We all know how when years have trained us into habitual impression of another's unkind feelings toward us, even when some circumstances which misled us are explained away, yet the habitual feeling so occupies the mind, that only a sense of justice leads us to say, "I know how false my prejudice has been; I know all is explained; I ought to confide in him, and I will." So the long unbelief of a heart unfits a soul to believe that God can, and will, and does forgive it; and with all the grace bestowed it requires an effort of the soul to rely and say I will trust his mercy through Christ. Thus the act of faith is simply "putting our trust" in the atonement.

But not only when sin may have destroyed the Christian's communion with the Father, and thrown him back to his first position, but sometimes under temptations, under peculiar circumstances, and in regard to particular points, that open vision and easy trust are withdrawn, and the soul has its reliance upon divine truth tested, and retains its title to the promises only by a sustained act of faith, a dauntless resolution to believe and rest calmly, come what may.

Thus, we are saved by faith. Not so much by faith of apprehension, which opens to us more and more the spiritual world; but by that simple resting upon Christ to do for us, and in us, what we cannot do ourselves. Consciously as a child, held and guided in the firm grasp of a father's hand, the soul feels itself upheld by a supernatural strength. Consciously, as when an electric current thrills new energy through the frame, the soul feels the presence of an energy not its own. It comprehends the experience of the great apostle: "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I live, I live by faith of the Son of God."—The Rev. T. F. R. Mercein.

Counsel to Young Converts.

Don't think that you have lost all your religion because you find out that you have made a mistake in something, or conclude that God is dead because the sky turns black sometimes. God is in the storm as much as He is in the sunshine. Make up your mind that you are going to believe in God, no matter what happens. No sensible man will tear up his railroad ticket because the train runs through a tunnel.

Determine to be a happy Christian whether you have a cent in your pocket or not. With God's grace it won't take much to make you rich.

Don't be a wobbling Christian. Keep your eye on Christ, and you won't have a bit of trouble in keeping even in your experience. Adopt a plan that will mean loyalty to God always, and stand upon it.

Get into a habit of feeling that God is interested in everything that concerns you. Keep in the closest communion with Him by asking and trusting Him constantly to manage you.

Never make a plan and leave God out. Make him first in all your undertakings. If you make a mistake, instead of sitting down to cry and fret about it, tell God all about it, and ask him to overrule it for good.

Maintain habits of secret prayer, and pray and praise while you work, or rest, or think. Ask God to help you love people you don't like.—Ram's Horn.

THE QUARTERLY CONFERENCE.

From time immemorial the quarterly meeting has been a vital factor in the machinery of Methodism, and if not needlessly nelgected or ignored it may continue so to be. It is a time for concentration of the forces in operation on a pastorate charge, including the presiding elder, preacher in charge, stewards, trustees, local preachers, exhorters, Sunday School Superintendents, class leaders, and church conference secretaries, and on to the humblest member of the church. They come together to make reports of their labors, devise plans for future work, preaching, exhort, pray and work for the salvation of souls and the up-building of the church. If the opportunity is properly improved by the pastor (and the presiding elder too), and the membership, and all come together in the unity of the Spirit and in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel it may and will be an occasion for the manifestation of great spiritual power. The presence (on a circuit) in the community, of leading members of the church from another village or settlement awakens interest and makes a favorable impression. It evinces a faith and zeal that become contagious. When we were a boy the quarterly meeting was usally announced a month or more before hand and re-announced and talked of at church and social gatherings—corn-shuckings, quiltings, log-rollings and such like—and prayed for at the prayer-meetings and family altars until every man, woman, and child in the neighborhood become imbued with the idea that something unusual was going to take place. As a rule they were not disappointed. Preachers and members fasted on Friday, and the meeting began on Friday night. The presiding elder preached on Saturday and the quarterly conference was held on Saturday afternoon. Penitents were called on Saturday night. The Sunday morning love-feast was a refreshing time, and opened the way for "the elder's sermon" and the holy sacrament that followed. By Sunday night there were frequently a number of conversions and accessions to the church, and a great victory was scored for the cause of Christ.

But now-a-days it sometimes occurs that half the members, to say nothing of the outsiders, scarcely hear of the quarterly meeting, or if they do, think little about it and make no effort to attend. We have known cases where there was no public announcement of the quarterly meeting in the congregation, no Saturday preaching—possibly the presiding elder did not arrive till Saturday night, while the preacher in charge came on the Sunday morning train. There was no official member present from outside the village and possibly those living near were not at the conference. There was no love-feast and no Lord's Supper administered, and about the only variation from the regular services was the presiding elder's sermon, which was closely criticised, and the "usual quarterly collection for the support of the ministry." On Monday the chief official (the P. E.) took his departure, and it was all over for another three months.

This ought not so to be. Though the presiding elder should happen to be inferior to the beloved pastor in oratorical gifts, this does not excuse the pastor or lay members for letting things run at such loose ends. And if the pastor and the circuit officials have become careless, the presiding elder is not justified in letting things go on at this poor, dying rate. We are all missing great personal blessings, losing wonderful opportunities for doing good, and the church of God is suffering great loss by this course of procedure.

If our standard bearers do not, in every case, meet our ideal as preachers they surely have some good qualities to recommend them, and they deserve our support. Let us begin diligently to inquire for the "old paths" and walk therein. If we continue to pander to the demands of a worldly and ease-loving spirit, Methodism will be shorn of her strength, and her crown will be given to another. We admire the zeal and punctuality of our Baptist brethren in their attendance upon the monthly Saturday church meeting, and the strictness and self-denial of the Salvation Army soldiers in prosecuting their work. Shall Methodists, with the history of the past and the incentives of the present before them, be less active and zealous in supporting the institutions that have been so wonderfully blessed of God? It is high time for us to awake out of our sleep. Let every Methodist, from the bishop and presiding elder to the humblest member of the church, resolve to do all in his power, from this time forward, to restore the quarterly meeting to its original prestige and make it on every pastoral charge a set time for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit and the favoring of our Zion.

—o—

EDITORIAL NOTES.

We sincerely regret to learn, through Brother Owen, of the protracted illness of our dear brother, Rev. J. W. Faubion of the Western Conference. He is a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, and his absence from the field will be felt. We join in earnest prayer for his speedy and complete restoration to health.

Brother Squires adapted himself with ease to the duties of his office as president of the District Conference and presided with dignity, impartiality and general acceptability.

The time of the District Conference was mostly occupied with discussions of the topics that were on the printed program. As a rule, they were very practical, and the discussions were spiritual and profitable, and the audiences in attendance at the daily sessions evinced more than an ordinary interest in them. It is well to vary the exercise on such occasions, but care should be taken to stress the preaching of the word and prayer for the out-pouring of the Holy Spirit in awakening, converting and sanctifying power. A good revival of religion, that will fuse the hearts of preachers and lay members and effect the conversion of even one poor soul. is of more permanent value than many discussions.

We regretted that our venerable brother, Rev. J. R. Waggener could not preach one of his soul-stirring sermons before a good audience during the District Conference. It would have been a treat to many.

We rejoiced to see the attendance of a number of young persons from a distance at the Conference—Miss Bessie Shaeffer, of Helena, Miss Donna Bell, of Boulder, and Brothers Gus. Williams and Robert Bell, of Stevensville. It evinces an interest in the church, that is commendable and will be helpful in many ways. Would that the number of such visitors could be quadrupled next year.

We were providentially hindered from hearing Brother Shaeffer's opening sermon on Monday night, but heard many kind words spoken of the intellectual and spiritual feast that it afforded them.

It was a pleasure to us to visit again the cozy, quiet and classic little city of Deer Lodge. We met many old friends, and we trust made some new ones. The people vied with each other in efforts to make the conference a success, and succeeded. The audiences were large, intelligent and attentive. Our church is a neccessity here, and is growing in favor with the people. Brother and Sister Britt are cozily domiciled in the little parsonage hard by the synagogue, and they have a warm place in the affections of the people. We heard many kind words spoken of Brother and Sister Tabor, the fruits of whose labor are visible. "Grandma" Lightfoot and Sister Lear were passing through sore afflictions, but we rejoice that they are both convalescent. There is much more in our heart that we would be delighted to say of our visit to Deer Lodge, but our columns are full, and we must desist.

We spent Easter Sunday at Willow Creek, where we tried to preach twice for Brother Goulder. We enjoyed the services very much. Brother Stateler was able to come out in the morning, but not at night; while feeble in body, he is strong in faith and in his desire and purpose to do something more to glorify is risen Lord. It is delightful to see the esteem in which this venerable father in Israel is held by his nearest neighbors and those who have been with him most and who know him best.

This issue of the paper is made up while the editor is "on the wing," and his correspondence from the home-office has failed to show up, all except one or two letters.

If preachers, when invited to preach upon special occasions, could always have the grace to preach the plainest, simplest sermons they can in the simplest and most earnest manner, instead of trying to show their learning or air their peculiar notions, how much more good would be accomplished. As a rule, common people desire and enjoy the "sincere milk of the word," more than any new doctrine or fine-spun and far-fetched theories.

Mr. Frederick Parker, of Three Forks, Montana, and Miss Hannah Bradley, of Willow Creek, Montana, were united in marriage by Rev. W. T. Goulder, at Willow Creek, Montana, March 30th, 1893. These enterprising young persons begin their married life by subscribing for the "Montana Methodist." This is a start in the right direction. We extend congratulations and commend their example to all others who are just launching their barques upon the sea of life together. The "Methodist" will help them to tide over many rough places and anchor safely on the evergreen shore. Send on your name and address.

A Well Spent Life.

A minister of the gospel was asked to visit a poor, dying woman. The messenger, being ignorant, could give no account of her state, except that she was a very good woman and very happy, and was now at the end of a well-spent life, therefore sure of going to heaven. The minister went, saw she was very ill, and after a few kindly inquiries about her bodily condition said: "Well, I understand you are in a peaceful state of mind, depending upon a well-spent life." The dying woman looked hard at him, and said- "Yes, I am in the enjoyment of peace. You are quite right; sweet peace, and that from a well-spent life. But it is the well-spent life of Jesus; not my doings, but his; not my merits, but his blood."—Reformed Church Record

LIGHT AND JOY.

BY C. H. SPURGEON.

I want to show how the work of God does create a joy-making people. As soon as ever we are converted, what is one of the first things that come of it? Why, joy. The morning I found Christ it snowed very hard. The snowflakes fluttered around me, like white doves, as I went home; and I felt just as light as those, for my soul was washed whiter than snow. It was not a gloomy winter's day to me; but all nature wore her bridal dress in sympathy with my delight. Was it not so with you on the day of your new birth? Were you not as happy as ever you could be when you first found the Savior? So far, you see the Lord creates joy; and it is better still farther on. When the creation of God goes on, and a man is helped to conquer sin, when the work of grace in his soul grows and increases, he cries: "Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory;" and he gets increased joy in his soul over every conquered sin. When you and I see sin subdued, do we not feel happy? Whenever the news comes to me that a man has been reclaimed from drunkenness, or a woman is saved from the streets, or when I hear of a hard-hearted sinner repenting, I rejoice in the Lord. Conversion days are our high holidays; revivals are our jubilees. Thus the Lord gives us opportunities for joy and rejoicing as His new creation work proceeds stage by stage. Better days are in store, it may be; and I trust that in years to come we shall more and more behold God working, and shall rejoice therein. But by and by there will be a still greater joy. We shall enter into heaven, and there will be joy among the angels and joy in our heart over God's new-creation work, which will proceed at a glorious rate. Then the nations will be converted to God. I know not when nor exactly how, but the day shall come when Christ shall reign from pole to pole. And what a joy that shall be! We shall indeed be glad in that which God creates, as the islands of the sea shall ring out His praise! Then Christ the Lord will come, and what joy and rejoicing there will be in that day when he has fully fashioned the new earth and the new heavens! His ancient people, the seed of Abraham, shall be gathered in with exultation. We will clap our hands when the long wandering nation shall turn unto the true God, and own the rejected Messiah, of the house of David; the Gentiles will not be jealous. They will rejoice as the Jew comes in; and then will the Jews rejoice over the Gentiles; as they see them worshiping Abraham's God. Everything that is to come in the eternal future flashes light into the eyes of believers, and calls upon them to rejoice in anticipation. Nothing prophesied should be dreaded by us. There is nothing foretold by seer or beheld in vision that can alarm the Christian. He can stand serenely on the brink of the great eternity and say: "Come on! Let every event foretold become a fact! Pour out your vials, ye angels! Fall, thou star called Wormwood! Come, Gog and Magog, to the last great battle of Armageddon!" Nothing is to be dreaded, nothing is to be feared, by those who are one with Jesus. To us remains nothing but joy and rejoicing, for God hath made His people a rejoicing; yea, His people a joy.

—o—

Seeketh Not Her Own.

Said a bright girl, who was no less and no more thoughtful than the average Christian, after hearing a missionary speak of her work: "To hear that woman talk makes me feel as if I had done nothing but match ribbons all my life!" What a blessed heavenly vision came to her in that contrast of a life spent for self with a life devoted to the uplifting of humanity! She saw a little way into the deep and glorious mystery of the Saviour's words: "He that keepeth his life shall lose it; and he that looseth his life for My sake and the Gospel's shall keep it unto life eternal."

O for a heavenly vision of this sort to break upon every Christian conscience, like the great light which shone from heaven upon Saul of Tarsus! "Matching Ribbons?" Yes; pursuits for which this is a synonym are occupying the time and energy of hundreds who are called by the name of Christ. They spend their money for that which is not bread, and their labor for that "which satisfieth not." Jesus sat beside the well at Samaria, tired and hungry. Yet when his desciples returned from the village with food, he said He had already been feed. "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." the sweet, unparalleled satisfaction of ministering to a needy, immortal soul. It is true that there never was so much philanthropic and religious work done as now, and yet it is done by the few. Hundreds of Christians are losing their share in the present joy of service as well as in the future reward. Hiw poor they are! Amusement and self-gratification consume the golden hours and waste the capabilities of the soul. O if they could but know the richness of a life swayed by that love which "seeketh not her own!" Some of the happy workers who receive uncalled-for pity from these idlers would be glad to share with them their joy of service. There is no joy sweeter than that of knowing that we have been of use to another, especially of spiritual things. But to have it we must be like Jesus, "who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross." He pleased not himself. His was a love that delighted in the sacrifice of self. O, that we might covet earnestly this best gift, "the love of God shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto us;" the love whose fruit is an unselfish life which seeketh not its own.

John B. Finch.

To all those who have been interested in the work of the temperance reform, the name of John B. Finch is familiar. He was an earnest Christian, and an enthusiastic temperance worker. He was born in Lincklaen, New York, March 17, 1852. In consequence of his poor health, he did not attend school until he was ten years old. For four years he attended the district schools near his home. He was not permitted to be very regular in his attendance, but was often forced to stay at home because of a lack of proper clothing. And yet he never fell behind in his classes. He attended the academy in the neighboring village of Cincinnatus.

To assist him to the necessary funds to enable him to complete his education, he taught a private school in the little village of East Pharsalia, some six or seven miles distant. One of his pupils was Retta L. Coy, whom he married on January 8th, 1871. Completing his studies at the school, and after a period of teaching, Mr. Finch began the study of law. At the age of twenty-four he was admitted to the bar. He early became interested in temperance work, and during 1877 lectured in Nebraska, (to which he had moved), in interest or the Red Ribbon movement, securing no less than 100,000 signers to the pledge. In the fall of 1879 he gave sixty-two successive lectures in the city of Omaha, the result of which was that 14,000 persons signed the pledge.

He lectured in all the leading cities, carrying conviction to many hearts. He was naturally an orator, and an audience was spell-bound at his flow of eloquence.

His last public address was delivered in Odd Fellow's Hall, in Lynn, Mass. The hall was packed and Mr. Finch never was more eloquent. By some inadvertence, the chairman of the meeting neglected to call upon the minister who had been invited to the platform for the purpose of opening the meeting with prayer. After being introduced to the audience, Mr. Finch rose and said, gently and reverently: "The principles of our party and its methods are such that we can go to God for his blessing. I therefore call upon Rev. Alexander Dight to offer prayer." During the prayer Mr. Finch stood with bowed head; when it was finished he commenced the address.

Take Short Looks.

A good rule is to take short views. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" no man is strong to bear to-day's load with to-morrow's load piled on top of it. The only look far ahead that you and I should take should be the look toward the judgment seat, and the offered crown at the end of the race. That is the way to get a taste of heaven in advance.—The Rev. T. L. Cuyler.

Job's Confession and Restoration.

Lesson Text.—Job 42: 1-10.

The Lesson Story.

By Cunningham Geikie, D.D., L L.D.

Strong in his integrity, yet unchanged in his loyal conviction that God must be just, in spite of all appearances to the contrary, Job, after maintaining his belief that he would be cleared by the Eternal if he could secure a trial before him, continues the illustration of his contention that wickedness is far from always meeting due punishment in this world (Job 24). He wonders why the ways of Providence are not justified to faithful souls by their being allowed to see their vindication. Why does God not fix days on which his judgments are publicly disclosed? For undoubtedly wickedness does, apparently, go unpunished in many cases. The poor, and even the widow, are plundered. They are so stripped, indeed, that they have to flee to the desert to live on roots and the like, as if they were beasts. Or they are kept as slaves, without even clothes being given them to cover them from the storm. Murderers and robbers flourish. Their name and heritage may suffer after their death, but during life they are "exalted."

All this cannot be denied, and hence Bildad, who next speaks, no longer assails Job with accusations, but contents himself with repeating that the distance between God and man involves impurity in all, so that Job is wrong in expecting or claiming acquittal. Job, in reply, while maintaining his integrity, freely assents to all that has been said of the majesty of God, but adds that, after all, we see but "the outskirts" of his ways. We catch a whisper of his plans, but the thunder of his power in its full sway is overwhelming, and beyond our faculties to understand (Job 26).

From the twenty-seventh to the thirty-first chapters the suffering patriarch continues to soliloquize on the whole question at issue, as if unconscious of the presence of his friends. He admits that he has stated his belief in the good fortune of the wicked too broadly. On reflection, he must admit that the wicked are punished in many cases. But this leaves the mystery of his own case unsolved; for he is not wicked, and yet he has been sorely stricken. His friends, in fact, had been trying to explain the inexplicable. Nor should this seem strange; for man has only limited faculties, and much, even in the world around, is beyond his comprehension Nothing, for example, is more astonishing, Job thinks, than the way in which the precious metals are brought from the depths of the hills by the miner (Job 28), and yet how little of the secrets of nature is made known even in such triumphs as this! Though we can thus pluck their secret from the bosom of the mountains, a glance at nature will show how utterly "past finding out" are "the ways of God."

He now (Job 29) breaks off wearisome argument to indulge in pensive retrospect. His thoughts go back to his prosperous past. The friendship of God, in those days of his "ripeness," watched over his tent, and his children were about him. He lived outside a well-ordered city, but not far from it. When he went out of his encampment-gate up to the town, and sat down in the open space before it, where the citizens gathered for business or gossip, he was treated with the most touching respect by all, from the youngest to the oldest, and from the poorest to the highest. He was, moreover, a judge sitting at the gate, and had earned the blessing of every class by his fearless punishment of the oppressor, however strong, and the vindication of the weak. Rich, and yet nobly upright and liberal, he dwelt "as a king" in his home.

But now (Job 30) the lowest affected to despise him! Even the sons of the tribes dispossessed by his stronger race, and driven to the wilderness to feed on salt-wort and broom-roots, and to live in caves and holes of the rocks,—wretched beings, who had been scourged out of the land,—made him their song and byword, and even insulted him by spitting in his face. They were glad to repay on the shaykh of their conquerors some of their cherished hatred. Nor was this all. His disease made life a burden.

Yet what had his life been? Did he not weep for any in trouble? Was he not grieved for the poor? He was chaste even in the indulgence of his eyes; he was never guilty of any impurity; the cause of any, even of his slaves, man or woman, was treated with absolute integrity; he had fed the hungry and clothed the naked; he had never made money his passion; he had never denied God by worshiping the sun or moon, as those around him did; he had never injured his enemy, or rejoiced at his calamity, though cursing a foe was so universal in the land, he had never done so; his house had always been open to the wayfarer; he had not even cherished sinful thoughts, in lack of power to vent his anger on the threatened vengeance of unfortunates who had suffered at his hand. Yet here was he, weighed down by troubles beyond any man.

The long speech of Elihu, which extends from the thirty-second to the thirty-eighth chapter, is regarded by some of the critics as an interpolation at a later period. Without giving an opinion on this, we may pass it over as only an interruption in the flow of the narrative.

Meanwhile, Job has lost the passionate intensity of his earlier frame of mind. He has come to the conviction that there is a life beyond this, and hence feels that, at least after death, all will be explained. Still, it is hard to suffer in the present world, when conscious that one has striven to serve and honor God. Like all the men of his day, he can think of suffering only as punishment, and would fain to know why it fell on him, of all people, so heavily. Would that God himself would explain the mystery! He has, at least, forgotten him. There can hardly be injustice or cruelty in the Eternal; yet how are things to be viewed so that he may be finally cleared from even the subdued thought of being the author of unfairness?

But now, by a grand conception, God is introduced as listening to his servant's cry, and deigning to address him from the midst of a wild tempest, the fit approach of Him whose "way is in the whirlwind and storm." The awful words sound nearly as follows: "Who is this that adds confusion to his high theme by foolish words? Thou hast asked to meet me; prepare to do so. Where wast thou when I founded the earth? Say, if thou knowest? Who measured out its parts? On what does it rest? Who laid its corner-stone, when the other races of the universe shouted for joy? Who shut up the sea in its appointed bounds, making clouds its veil, and mists the swaddling-banks of its infancy? Hast thou ever controlled the rising of the day,—that supreme wonder of nature? Hast thou found out the secret fountain of the ocean, or explored the abyss of its depths? Have the gates of the pale kingdoms of the dead been opened to thee? Hast thou explored the wide breadth of the earth? Where does light dwell, and where darkness? Hast thou entered the storehouse of the snow or of the hail? How are the light and the winds sent on their mission? Who sends out the rainstorm, and maketh a path for the lightning? Do you know the father of the rain, or of the dewdrop? or the mother of the ice and hoarfrost? Canst thou bind into their places the seven stars, or unbind Orion's belt? or make the constellations appear in their season? or guide the Bear and her sons?

"Turn now to the creatures of the earth. Canst thou find prey for the lion? or provide food for the young ravens? or tell all about the wild goat? Who made the wild ass so untameable in his wilderness? Can you make a docile slave of the wild ox? Why is the stork so kind to its young, and the ostrich so careless of hers? Dost thou give its strength to the horse? Has thou clothed him with his quivering mane?....Did your cleverness teach the hawk to fly south in winter, or the eagle to build on the lofty crags?" But now the Almighty is represented as stopping to ask if Job, who has reproved him, still wishes to contend with him.

But the patriarch is not yet silenced; he tells God he is too weak to answer. He will say no more. He is passive, however, rather than satisfied. Once more, therefore, Jehovah speaks. Job is asked to put himself on a level with him by exhibiting the same powers. Men catch and hold the mighty hippopotamus, because he has ordained that it should be so. But they can do nothing with the crocodile, because a different nature has been given him. "And, this being so, wilt thou stand up against me, his maker, to whom all that is under the whole heaven belongs."

Now, at last Job is meekly submissive. "I know," says he, "that thou canst do all things, and that nothing is too hard for thee. Thou saidst, 'Who is this that is darkening the divine counsels with foolish words?' I confess that I have spoken of things I did not understand. I had only heard of thee; when I rashly proposed to put thee to the question; but now that my eyes see thee, I retract my audacity, and repent in dust and ashes." He does not admit any want of integrity. Between himself and his fellow-man, he could still claim to be more righteous than they. But he now realized, in a measure, that, though free from blame towards men, he could not dare to take the same position towards God. For God was not only wiser, but holier, than any of his creatures; and it was nobler and better to trust him, in even the sorest difficulties, than to look to our own human reason for a solution.

The end of the narrative does not require lengthened notice. The loyalty that stood true to God amidst all doubts was acknowledged by him and the night of sorrow passed into the brightness of a morning without clouds; Job's prosperity in his old age justifying him in his steadfast assurance that we cannot judge of God's heart by his hand, and that the sufferings of men in this life are no measure of their goodness or the reverse. Christ's doctrine, illustrated by his reference to those killed by the tower at Siloam, was, in fact, anticipated by the lesson of the narrative of the sufferer.—S. S. Times.

Feeding and Washing.

There is a little girl with us at home just now; and she very much reminds me of not a few of God's children. She is always glad and happy at meal-time, but not at all satisfied at washing-time. She does not like to be washed. This is just the case with many of the Lord's people. They are so glad to be fed—to listen to some comforting and building-up addresses; but they are not all satisfied when God's word is brought to bear on their ways in the way of washing them from everything not in accordance with that word. But the washing is as needful as the feeding. Indeed, if we will not allow God's word to wash us, we need not expect that He will feed us.

DISTRICT CONFERENCE PROCEEDINGS.

The eleventh session of the Helena District Conference of the Montana Annual Conference M. E. Church, South, convened in the Methodist church at Deer Lodge, Montana, at 9:30 o'clock A. M., Monday, March 28th, 1893, J. E. Squires, presiding elder, in the chair.

T. W. Alton was elected secretary and Miss Donna Bell assistant.

Members present:—R. H. Shaeffer, R. S. Clark, E. L. Lee, W. M. Britt, R. L. Glasgow, J. McLaughlin, W. O. Waggener, J. R. Waggener, H. C. Blakeman, T. W. Alton, A. C. Williams, Robert Bell.

Squires and Britt were appointed a committee on public worship; Clark, Shaeffer, Waggener, Kemper and Stanley, on Missions; Britt and Blakeman, on quarterly conference records. It was decided to have the morning session continue from 9:30 to 11 a. m., and preaching service from 11 to 12 o'clock. Afternoon session from 2 o'clock to 4:30.

Reports of charges were called for. The P. E. gave a brief report of the district. There had been about 115 accessions to the church since the annual conference, and there remains a debt of $225 on the district parsonage located at Deer Lodge. Helena Station was reported by R. H. Shaefler. The finances in very good condition. About half of the preacher's salary paid to date; $65 on hand for domestic missions: Bishop's Fund and Church Extension paid, and something on hand for foreign missions. All assessments will be paid. Congregations improving. There is great need of a new and better church building.

Brother Lee preached a good sermon at eleven o'clock.

The afternoon session was opened with singing and prayer, conducted by J. R. Waggener. Letters received from Brothers Stateler and Tabor announcing that they could not attend. W. O. Waggener reported Stevensville and Corvallis charge. There were eleven regular preaching places. Spiritual condition not what it ought to be; family worship greatly neglected; fifty-six conversions and forty-four accessions to date. Finances behind. The Conference collections will be paid in full. A new church enterprise on hand at Corvallis. Pastor preaches to about 200 people during the month. Two church houses; one Epworth League organized at Stevensville.

The subject, "Meeting our Appointments," was discussed by E. L. Lee and others.

W. O. Waggener preached a well prepared, instructive and highly entertaining discourse on Missions at 7:30 o'clock, p. m.

During the afternoon session T. W. Alton led in the discussion on "Our Pulpit Against the Gross Sins of the West," and was followed by other brethren. It was an interesting theme.

R. H. Shaeffer conducted three devotional exercises on the morning of the second day and afterward led in the discussion of "The True Policy of our Church in this Pield, in which most of the members took part.

R. S. Clark declined to preach at 11 o'clock, and by motion the regular program was set aside and he invited to preach at 7:30 p. m. E. J. Stanley, who had been detained by a delayed train, arrived just at this juncture and was pressed into service to fill the vacant pulpit—a clear case of what is sometimes called "snap judgment."

J. McLaughlin opened the conference at 2 p. m. "Church Finances" was ably discussed by W. M. Britt, who was followed by Shaeffer, Waggener, Glasgow, Stanley and others. Many excellent points were brought out. Squires talked on "Methods of Work," and McLaughlin said, this was the only subject yet discussed, that he knew anything about. The P. E. then reported the East Helena charge, the most encouraging feature of which is a new parsonage which is approaching completion.

The following were elected lay delegates to the ensuing annual conference, to be held in Butte City: A. G. Clarke, J. W. Kemper, H. B. Bell, A. H. Barret. Alternates, E. G. Brooke, H. C. Blakeman. Townsend was selected as the place for holding the next annual conference.

R. S. Clark preached at 7:30 p. m. to a crowded house. The sermon evinced close thought and careful preparation, but contained sentiments, particularly those relating to the near approach of the millennium, that were dissented from by most of the congregation.

The devotional exercises of the third days' morning session were conducted by R. H. Shaeffer. Several of the brethren led in prayer.

R. S. Clark read a paper on "The Legal Status of Children," which the author was requested by the conference to have published in the "Montana Methodist."

The committee on Missions made its report which was adopted and is published elsewhere.

Brother McLaughlin made an interesting talk on "Music in the Church and Sunday School," which provoked considerable discussion.

The committee on Quarterly conferences made its report which was adopted.

"How to get ready for a quarterly Conference" was discussed by Glasgow, Stanley, Squires, and others.

Fifteen minutes were devoted to reporting the pastoral charges. T. W. Alton reported a membership of 95 at Butte. Congregations from 40 to 100; house very small, but a new one in a better location. Hard to get teachers for the Sunday School. Finances behind; collections will be brought up. Epworth League very prosperous—the principal hope of the church—numbers, 30 members.

Townsend, E. L. Lee. Some encouraging features. Have been 10 accasions. Forty or fifty persons out on Sunday morning. About 35 in Sunday School. Work encouraging at other points on the charge. Another Sunday School recently organized, and one in prospect. The work is alive.

Belgrade, J. McLaughlin. About 30 people come out about Belgrade. A church building and a good parsonage there. A good point. Shields river is a promising point. They want the gospel, but get it only once a month, not then, when it storms. A fine opening. Good congregations. About 20 families in reach of the preaching place. They come from 4 to 5 miles to preaching. A good Sunday School in operation there. About 18 conversions on the charge this year.

Boulder and Alhambra, R. S. Clark. Membership 86. Sunday School not so large—7 additions since conference. Finances away behind. Sunday School not so prosperous just now, but hopeful of better things in the near future.

The Conference then adjourned.

—o—

SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION.

Immediately following the adjournment of the District Conference, the District Sunday School convention was called to order. There was quite a number of Sunday School workers present, and it was moved that all present be requested to take part in the proceedings.

Rev. J. E. Squires was chosen president and Miss Donna Bell, Secretary.

E. L. Lee presented the subject of "The Pastor in the Sunday School." He was followed by Brothers Britt, Clark, Shaeffer, Lee, and Miss Larver, Harry Reed, and Miss Williams. The use of tobacco by the pastor, and its influence upon Sunday School scholars, was raised and discussed in a lively but good natured manner.

"Teaching the Infant Class," was also discussed by various persons. Prof. M. O. Reed presented an admirable paper on "The Use of the Blackboard in the Sunday school."

A children's mass-meeting was announced for seven-thiryty p. m. to be addressed by Brothers Squires, Britt, Alton, Clark, McLaughlin and Stanley.

At the appointed hour the house was well filled with children and grown people. Brothers McLaughlin and Britt made short talks and were followed by the presiding elder, who held the attention of the audience for a half hour or more in a lively speech was that interesting to all.

The audience joined in sing. ing "God be with you till we meet again," and the convention adjourned with the benediction by E. J. Stanley.

RESOLUTIONS.

In view of the open iniquity and gross sins prevalent in nearly all parts of Montana, and especially in our larger cities, and considering the eminent ability and success of Rev. Sam. P. Jones in combatting the flagrant forms of vice;

Be it resolved, That the secretary be instructed to write to Brother Jones in the name of this conference, urging him to come to hold meetings in this field at his earliest convenience.

W. M. Britt.
W. O. Waggener.

Be it resolved, that a rising vote of thanks be given by the District Conference and visiting members to the citizens of Deer Lodge for their hospitality in entertaining the conference in such a handsome manner.

R. H. Shaeffer.
R. S. Clark.

The District Conference passed a resolution, signed by R. S. Clark and E. L. Lee, expressing deep regret at the departure of Bishop Haygood from the West, when his presence and labors have so greatly strengthened our cause.

——o——

REPORT ON MISSIONS.

ADOPTED BY THE DISTRICT CONFERENCE.

From the reports made by the presiding elder, the preachers in charge of our circuits and stations, and laymen from various portions of the Montana Conference, it is ascertained that our work as far as it is efficiently manned, is in a prosperous condition. A number of parsonages are in course of erection, new churches are being enterprised, revivals are blessing the labors of our preachers, Sunday Schools organized, souls converted to God, and our church is growing in favor with God and with the people.

We are grateful to the Parent Board of Missions for the recognition it has given our work, and the slight increase in the appropriations to this field during the three years past. The money has been judiciously expended, and we believe that the increased confidence inspired among the people and the fresh impetus given our work by this action has amply justified this increased expenditure of missionary funds in our midst.

The bishops and other connectional officers, together with leading men of our church who have visited us and acquainted themselves with our situation, say that we are needed here and are doing good work. But all agree that our work here, is not receiving the assistance from the home-church, that its importance demands. A number of our preachers are doing double duty and on salaries that are insufficient to keep them. Some have spent what little surplus means, they possessed, in their zeal to sustain the cause so dear to their hearts.

Then, besides the territory now occupied by us there are new fields that earnestly call for our occupancy. Doors are open to us, which we must enter, and enter at once, if we do our duty in carrying out the great commission given us by our Lord. Some of our charges are too large and must be divided. We need at least three active and efficient men in the Bitter Root Valley, where our work is very promising. One new man is needed in the Deer Lodge Valley, one in Gallatin Valley, one at Great Falls, and two presiding elders are needed, instead of one. This enlargement of work is imperative and calls for a material increase of missionary funds. It is of vital importance that this be granted at once. There are outlying fields where the people are entirely pestitute of the gospel and are calling for it at our hands. In not a few places one thousand dollars expended now is equivolent to four or five, or possibly ten, thousand spent a few years later.

Therefore be it resolved,

1st, That we respectfully, but most earnestly petition the Board of Missions at its ensuing session at Kansas City, Mo., to appropriate at least $7,200 to the work in the Montana Conference.

2nd, That we will do all in our power to bring our work up to a self-supporting basis, at the earliest date possible.

3rd, That we take pleasure in announcing that our Conference has paid in full its assessments for missions and Church Extension, raised more than the amount apportioned as our share of the missionary debt, and that we will continue to diffuse and endeavor to increase the missionary spirit among our people and diligently urge them to greater liberality in their contributions to our missions at home and abroad.

Signed—R. H. Shaeffer, R. S. Clark, W. O. Waggener, E. J. Stanley, Committee.

FROM ATLANTA, KANSAS.

Dear Brother:—Enclosed find one dollar to renew my subscription to the Methodist. I could not do without the paper. It is a source of much comfort to me, and a means of grace. I wish you much success. May the Lord bless the work in the West.

I am getting along very nicely. Think we are making some advancements, spiritually. Yesterday was my third quarterly meeting. Brother Broadhurst, in the absence of Bro. Faubion, P.E. conducted the services. Brother Faubion has been sick for eight weeks. We are much concerned about him and are praying that he will soon be restored to health again. The service yesterday was a spiritual feast to all. The Holy Spirit was present very graciously. Pray for us.

A Motor-Car Lesson.

One of the most serious difficulties that the motor car service has to contend with in severe winter weather is the interruption of the electric current by ice and snow upon the rails. A little snow upon the rails will make a car lifeless, and if it be evening, it will be made dark as well as motionless. Ice or snow underneath it is as serious an interruption as the loss of contact with the wire overhead.

In the religious life the heart must be in contact with humanity by duty as well as with heaven by prayer. A car looks more respectable on the track than it does in the ditch, but if the electric current does not pass through it, it is motionless, though on the rails. There are Christians who are fixed in religious forms and even in the pathway of obedience, but their hearts are not in real touch with the lines of duty, and they are accordingly simply respectably dead. No grace will come in by prayer that we are not ready to let out in obedience. The circuit must be complete before divine fire either illuminates or empowers us.

We saw a car started the other day by being jumped on. The motor man and conductor jumped on the platform till the wheels struck through the snow to the rails. The instant that the wheels really touched the track, the car went ahead though it was heavily loaded. There are many lifeless members in our churches that might possibly be set in motion if a fearless and vigorous preacher would "jump" on them. A gospel shock might shake their hearts through the snow of indifference to the track of loving service.

But we would advise the powerless professor to save his pastor the trouble A man is not a mere machine after all. The heart can melt its own snow if it will. That is better than having the preacher pound you through it, or even try to dig you out. Both heaven and daily life are brought in touch by a real personal consecration to God. The Church would move forward more triumphantly if there were less snow upon the track.—N. Christian Advocate.

Shut in.

BY THE REV. HENRY BURTON, M. A.

Shut in, but not alone;
Who closed the door, Himself is here,
Speaking in words of heavenly cheer,
And calling me His own.

I see the clouds sail by,
Like silent ships on silent seas;
But winds and clouds their Sovereign please,
Their path is marked on high.

God's will is in the rain,
The seasons of the rounding year;
It glistens in the falling tear;
God's will is in my pain.

So in that Will I rest;
His loving hand makes all my bed,
And on that hand I lay my head,
Remembered, loved, and blest.

The Sabbath comes and goes,
Bringing its hush of peace, its silent claim;
But not for me the temple psalm—
Yet this my Father knows.

He giveth songs at night,
And through the day sweet anthems roll
Within the chancel of the soul
To Him who makes all bright.

I dare not then repine,
But wait to do the Father's will,
Bidding my doubts and fears be still;
"My times" are His, not mine.

Precious Thoughts from Phillips Brooks.

The recent death of Bishop Brooks, which will be lamented all over the world whither his winged words have gone, recalls afresh some of the precious thoughts which will ever stand associated with his genius. One of his most characteristic sayings is the following, taken from the first sermon in his first volume: "All through the ranges of human life, from lowest up to the highest, any religious conception of human greatness must be ultimately reducible to this: a quality in any man by which he is capable first of taking into himself, and then of distributing through himself to others, some part of the life of God." This greatness of transmissiveness, found in its perfection in the one life of that Lord whom this great preacher, like every other truly great preacher, perpetually held up before the people, was also found in very large measure in his own life. He lived not for himself. He felt that what God gave him was for the benefit of his brothers. The mighty thoughts which flowed into his mind as into some vast distributing reservoir he made haste to pour forth for the thirsty souls of men. He radiated the light divine which came to him from communion with the heavens. And since this is a greatness of quality rather than of quantity or size, it is something in which we all may and should share.

Another characteristic utterance of the mighty Boston preacher whose voice we shall hear no more, is this: "There is no escape from the slavery of other men like that which comes of the intelligent and earnest service of other men." Freedom by service; this is indeed a great truth, worthy of much meditation. It is Jesus that makes us free, and yet it is Jesus whom we delight to hail as King. "I will walk at liberty," said David, "for I keep Thy commandments." Having found our true Lord, we have found deliverance from all thraldom. "In a service that Thy love appoints," says Miss Waring, "there are no bonds for me." And Faber voices the same sentiment when he sings,—

"And He has breathed into my soul
A special love to Thee;
A love to lose my will in His,
And by that loss be free."

This is the secret of true freedom. There is no such perfect liberty. We escape slavery to the world by entering the glorious service of God. And it is a similar, but in some respects subtler, truth that we escape slavery to men by entering the service of men. "Call no man your master," said Jesus; and yet, "Let him that is chief among you be your servant." He who is consecrated to the great purpose of compassing men's salvation will care little for their applause, will not be at the beck of their whims. Merely how they are minded towards him will not weigh with him much because his whole thought is bent on lifting up Christ before them, that they may be lifted up.

Bishop Brooks well says: "It is almost as presumptuous to think you can do nothing as to think you can do everything. The latter folly supposes that God exhausted Himself when He made you; but the former supposes that God made a hopeless blunder when He made you, which it is quite as impious for you to think." He further intimates that this false humility which enfeebles and paralyzes, in distinction from the true humility which stimulates, comes from an over-thought about self, and so is really pride. "Any man who is good for anything, if he is always thinking about himself, will come to think himself good for nothing very soon." Hence the best thing to do is to stop thinking about self, to shake off this poisoning self-consciousness, this over-sense of one's own personality, to forget self by becoming absorbed in the desire to serve God and bless our fellowmen. Duty and love are the two powers that will rescue us from this bondage—duty to Him above us, love to those around us. Here is our hope for all noble and truly humble work. This puts us into right relations with others, and frees us from those false relations which cripple and harm.

—o—

"Having in my youth severe notions of piety," says a Persian writer, "I used to arise in the night watches to meditate and pray, and read the Koran. One night, fully occupied with these practices, my father, a man of practical piety, awoke. 'Behold,' said I, 'thy other children are lost in irreligious slumber, while I alone am awake to praise God.' 'Son of my soul,' answered he, 'it is better to sleep, than wake to remark the faults of thy brethren!'"

It is easier to learn than to unlearn, then let us be careful to learn only truth.

"And as He Prayed the Fashion of His Countenance Was Altered."

Viewed in the light of this example of our Lord, it seems to me that prayer is the art of finding heaven wherever we are: of coming into touch, even amidst the commonest surroundings, with things which eye hath not seen nor ear heard. Friends, our life is a pretty hard one, and full of sharp contradictions. We cannot live steadily in contact with visible things and be at the same time acquiring the resources that shall make us able to confront the dangers and difficulties that a world of visible things steadily brings with it. Trees root in the ground and leaf in the air. Christian must root in air and leaf at the ground. It does not quite reach the mark to say that Christian life is composed of little deeds patiently done, little words faithfully said. Christian life is not "composed." "Composed" means put together. Christian life is not "put together." Christian life is celestial supply, secured by dwelling in heavenly places, communing with heavenly powers; and daily Christian living is the process of expending in the valley what we have first gained in the heights. That was the art of Christ's life, and must be the art of every life that will essay to imitate His in purity, beauty, and power. Prayer is not, first of all, asking for things; asking for life, for health, for prosperity; nor is it, even, asking for a little of this, that, or the other heavenly grace; like the housewife who steps up to the counter with her orders and goes away with a half dozen little packages of culinary commodities. The branch does not come up to the vine and say: "O blessed vine! give me, I pray thee, a little sap and a little fiber and a little bark and a little chlorophyl." The branch is united to the vine, lives in the vine, and the vine-life becomes in the branch both sap, fiber, bark, buds, leaves, and chlorophyl.

Sometime when the contradictions have all gone out of our hearts, and the outside discords, which possibly are but the untunefulness of our own spirits flung into the air, have disappeared, then perhaps this going up into the mountain to win a vision that shall brighten the valley may no longer be needed, and this going into a closet to consult an oracle whose words will guide us through the labyrinth of each day's perplexities may cease to be required. But, for the present, we cannot dispense with the occasions that shall render to us the like office that the Mount of Transfiguration rendered to the Lord, giving to us likewise that sense of the celestial world, and that experience of the heavenly powers, that shall be reinforcement to us when the brightness is passed by and we are immersed, like the Lord, in the cares and engrossments that always lie at the foot of the mountain, however resplendent it may be at the top.

And the prayer with which we close another service of devout conference is this: that it may become more and more a part of our life to tarry in heavenly places; to wait in the presence of God; to draw into spiritual touch with our Saviour; that so, as we step forth into the world again day by day, something of the quietness gained in the heights may counteract the tremor of the life that we may live in the valley, and the revealed glory of the Lord be as a lingering presence to clear our vision and confirm our faith and to brighten the path we daily tread.—From sermon by Dr. C. H. Parkhurst

TEMPERANCE

In these days Gladstone is uttering most inspiring words on the temperance question. Last June he said: "The Liberal party is determined as one man to place in the hands of the local committees the power of putting an end to a traffic which they believe in a multitude of instances to be detrimental and pernicious in the highest degree to the social and moral as well as the physical life of the community." In December at Liverpool he is still stronger: "This great plague and curse, gentlemen, let us all remember, is a national curse, calamity and scandal." Some years ago he said that "intemperance destroys more lives than war, famine and pestilence together." Yet in 1867 Gladstone declared that he was not a temperance man himself and did "not approve of enforcing abstinence upon others." It is a long time, however, in temperance reform since 1867, and even political leaders like Gladstone are recognizing the rise of a better public sentiment.

Here is the opinion of another Englishman whose vision was clear one hundred and fifty years ago: "Those who sell this poison murder his majesty's subjects by wholesale. Neither does their eye pity nor spare. They drive them to hell like sheep. And what is their gain? Is it not the blood of these men? Who, then, would envy their large estates and sumptuous palaces? A curse is in the midst of them; the curse of God cleaves to the stones, the timber, the furniture of them. Blood, blood is there! The foundation, the floor the walls, the roof are stained with blood! And canst thou hope, oh thou man of blood, canst thou hope to deliver down thy fields of blood to the third generation? Not so; for there is a God in heaven; thy name shall be rooted out." John Wesley, looking to God, did not need to wait for rising public sentiment to show him the truth.

I have found that the honest truth of our own mind has a certain attraction for every other mind that loves truth honestly.

The Lord often sees a great man where the world sees only a ragged, fatherless, penniless little boy.

WAITING FOR THE TRAIN.

Talk about the inconvenience and annoyance of waiting for a delayed train. We have waited twenty-nine solid consecutive hours at Garrison, Montana, for no other purpose, and those who have been caught there, especially before the hotel was built, know what that means. We waited almost that long at Grand Island last May, when we were in great haste to get home. But the most trying and unpleasant experience we ever had in this line, was while waiting recently at the Willow Creek station, from 11:15 a. m. to 3:15 next morning for the west-bound Northern Pacific train to Butte and Missoula. During the day we had the company of Bro's. Stateler and Goulder to cheer us, when we were not engaged in writing editorials, with our knee for a desk, for the "Methodist." There was no telegraph station, and it was not safe to be absent from the place for a moment, for no one knew the time when the train would arrive. All went well until darkness closed in upon the scene, and the store, which had been a shelter for us during the day and where the kind lady kindly gave us our dinner, was closed and we—the mail-carrier and the writer—stood without in the darkness, exposed to the chilling blasts of one of the most ruthless south-west windstorms that we have ever encountered. It blew a hurricane. We found refuge in a lone empty box-car, where we walked and went through all sorts of gymnastics to keep from freezing, until my partner grew tired and sleepy and went home, and left this scribe alone to wait, wait, wait, and watch, watch, watch, peering every moment into the darkness looking for the headlight to come into view. Eyelids grew heavy and limbs weary with continued exercising, but sleep and rest were absolutely out of the question. To retreat to the parsonage was to miss the train, disappoint our friends, and wait another day, with a chance to repeat the same thing over the next night again; and a moment's coveted slumber, while curled up in a corner, might be followed by the same result. The very car in which we were housed seemed lonely—it was the only one there— as it reeked and rocked in the furious wind. The storm only appeared lively. It seemed to laugh at and mock us in our weariness and our woo. We thought of many scenes and incidents of olden times to keep our courage up. It was on this same level plane, between the Madison and Jefferson rivers, that Colter, the trapper and frontiersman, made a desperate race for his life nearly a hundred years ago, naked and barefooted, under the burning sun and over beds of bristling prickly-pears, with a legion of Blackfoot savages at his heels and thirsting for his blood. We thought also of the boy who "stood on the burning deck whence all but him had fled," while "the flame that lit the battle's wreck, shone round him o'er the dead." We remembered the time when we stood guard for our comrades on a dark night away in the wilderness, while savage foes were supposed to be lurking near, and also recalled to mind the fact that not a mile from this very station, once when belated in our arrival at the house of a friend, (it was during the Indian troubles), and almost overcome with fatigue, we were brought to our senses by having a needle gun (a rifle) pointed at us through the window by our host who had taken us for a savage on murder intent. There was something exciting in all these incidents, to the principal actors, something to keep awake one's drowsy powers. But what excitement is there in straining your eyes sixty or seventy-five times every hour or more during a night, looking down the track and out into the inky abyss for the head-light that does not appear. You imagine if you could only see just a little farther, or just around the curve, it would be in sight. The next moment, the next time you look, it need surely be there. The conductor on the down-freight said it was ten hours late, and now it is thirteen. Surely, oh, without doubt, it must come soon. What can be the trouble? If "disappointment sinks the heart of man," under ordinary circumstances, what must be the effect of five hundred such disappointments in one night upon an editor, homeward bound, and imprisoned in a stationary box-car with an opening barely sufficient to look out and take observations? But hope—desire with expectation—that precious boon that remained in Pandora's box of blessings for man when all the rest had fled, remained in this "box" also and brought a blessing to one poor prisoner. At last the light appeared, small, but steadily growing brighter and causing us to leap and shout for joy; then the train, which carried us safely to Butte and in due time on to our home in the prettiest valley in all the North-west. How glad we were that we had the grit and the grace to adhere to our purpose, though it required some personal discomfort at the time, and thereby accomplish what we had undertaken.

After all, what is there that is worth having either in this world or the next, that can be gained without selfdenial? May we ever be just as faithful and persevering in waiting and watching for the train that is coming one of these days with the Great Conductor on board to carry us to our home "over there" in that "better country," that land that is far away and that is fairer than day.

HERE AND THERE.

As will be seen in another column, Rev. J. B. Parnall's health is better, and he and Sister Parnall will start shortly on a visit to England to be absent a year. We wonder they are elated. We rejoice with them and wish them a pleasant and prosperous voyage, a delightful visit with the "friends they loved in youth," and a safe return to their adopted home— the great West.

Rev. T. W. Alton reports that his last quarterly meeting was a delightful occasion, and the presiding elder pronounced the church, in some respects, in better condition than he had ever seen it before. We rejoice with him. May it grow better and better.

The District Conference at Deer Lodge requested the publication of Brother Clark's paper on "The Legal Status of Children," which appears in another column. It is worthy of a careful perusal, whether you agree with the sentiments expressed or not. Brother C. is one of the closest thinkers in the conference.

Rev. R. B. Swift reports the Spokane District, East Columbia Conference, in good condition; 120 addtions on eight charges since conference, two church building enterprises on hand, and their share of the missionary debt paid in good season.

Rev. T. W. Flowers and wife have returned from Mississippi, where they went last winter on a visit and are better satisfied with Montana than ever. They are in excellent health, and look ten years younger than when they left. They are accompanied by their nephew, Rev. W. W. Flowers, a young man who is a local preacher in our church.

E. G. Brooke, of Whitehall, Montana, has 320 acres of land located in the Jefferson Valley, near Whitehall, which he offers for sale, we believe, at ten dollars per acre. He considers it very cheap at this price, and offers the proceeds of one quarter section towards building a church at Whitehall. Write to him for particulars.

Rev. W. O. Waggener recently delivered a sermon at Corvallis on "The Holy Spirit," which is one of the best we have ever heard him preach, and the equal of any we ever heard at all on this subject. Would that we could give it to our readers. It was orthodox to the core, clear, strong and forceful, and made a fine impression.

Rev. R. S. Clarke writes, from Boulder, that the county Sunday-school convention has just closed a two days' session at that place. Some valuable papers were read. It was the sense of the convention, and resolved, that wherever there are religious persons capable of conducting religious exercises for the children, that the children should, with the consent of their parents or guardians, be formed into a class and helped and encouraged in religious work, with a view to their conversion, or to the training them up in religion. Our brother regaads this as a departure in Sunday school work that will soon become universal, and will under God, be productive of gratifying results.

——o——

ABOUT LEVEL.

The Texas "Christian Advocate" intimates that there is a strong sentiment in the M. E. Church, South, in the West, in favor of the organic union of the two Methodisms. We are not advised of any such feeling in the West. We doubt if there is a man in the M. E. Church, South, west of the Rocky mountains who favors organic union. We repeat the statement several times made by us that the relations between the two churches in the West are most amicable. Fraternity with us is a fact. There is not a minister of the M. E. Church in California whom we do not love as a brother. Our relations with many of them are as intimate as with the brethren of our own communion; but the matter of organic union is seldom discussed, for the reason that it is regarded as undesirable by us, and in every way impracticable. If fortune or circumstances put us where our own church was not represented, we could work cheerfully in the M. E. Church, as many of our people have done. But as matters now stand, we believe Southern Methodism has a distinct mission, which organic union would make impossible, and for that reason we hold that it is wise to abide as we are. This is the sentiment of the whole West.—Pacific Methodist Advocate.

——o——

Along The Line.

FROM PENDLETON, ORE.

Dear Methodist:— As I have kept silent thus far this year I thought I would drop you a line. I have held one special meeting, assisted by Brothers Bell, Palmer, and Fancher. While there was no great stir, yet I feel that good seed was sown which another may reap. We have had six accessions since conference, four by vows, one by letter, and one by baptism.

We are laboring and praying that we may have a good time at conference. We have some as faithful members here as there are anywhere in the conference. They are ready for every good work. Last Sunday, after the sermon, I made a call for the conference collections, and met with a liberal response, raising $41.80 in cash and good subscriptions. Pray for us, that the good Lord may come in power.

FROM PALOUSE, WASH.

To the "Methodist":— A soft voice from the hills of the Palouse Country. Snow is nearly all gone. Some on the north hillsides yet. We have had a long and happy winter. As for me, it has been the happiest I have ever seen, but not the happiest I ever expect to see.

Bro. Compton held a meeting at Palouse City, which resulted in several conversions and a number of accessions to the church. Bro's. Swift, Hornbuckle, and Skee assisted, one at a time. Brother Skee did some fine preaching, pleading with sinners in the most sympathetic way and earnest manner I ever heard; yet they would resist the Spirit. But Christian people will continue to pray for them.

May the Lord bless the little "Montana Methodist" unto much good, even unto the conversion of many souls, and unto grander ends. Glory to God for the good that it has done. God bless its editor. Amen.

FROM BROTHER PARNALL.

Our readers will be pleased to read the following extracts from a private letter from Rev. J. B. Parnall, dated Coquille, Coos Co., Ore., March 28th, 1893. He says:

"You will be glad to know that our health is improving somewhat of late, although neither of us are at all strong yet. Still I think we are now no weaker than when we left Montana last summer, but that is not saying much. I have some news for you. We start for England in about a month on a visit of a year or more! Our friends there have been urging us to take that course, and finding that we can make satisfactory financial arrangements to defray the expenses of the trip we have just a day or two past decided on going (D V.) Does this surprise you? It almost surprises us, at any rate it very much excites us. However, duty, affection and judgment, or reason, all seem to indicate that this is the proper course to pursue. In my case a year's rest from ministerial work is imperative to me. Whilst this is a good climate for us, there is nothing here that I can do to keep myself from idleness and bring in a little revenue. It would be very tame doing nothing here for a year where we might at the same time be enjoying ourselves in a climate equally as good with friends and loved ones from whom we have been parted so long. Having nothing now to bind us to this country for the present, it seems like our duty, as well as privilege, to return to the "old country" for awhile and recreate amongst "old friends, old scenes." I shall expect to take a supernumerary relation at the next session of the Columbia Conference.

About the 24th of April we expect to start by water to San Francisco—the wagon road being impassable at this season of the year, except to equestrians. After stopping a short time in St. Joseph, Mo., we shall go direct home (D. V.). It is a long and fatiguing journey to take, especially trying for Mrs. P., but I trust the Lord will bless and prosper us on the way.

Be assured that we shall not cease to feel a deep interest in our Montana friends, even when older and nearer friends (according to the flesh) surround us. Change address of our "Montana Methodist" to Treworrick, St. Ewe, Meragessey, Cornwall England.

The weather here has only now begun to feel warm or spring-like—so much cold rain before. Many regrets are expressed over the prospect of our speedy departure, and we are sorry to leave on some accounts. This is a very needy field, spiritually.

Yours as Ever,
J. B. Parnall.

FROM THE MISSION ROOMS.

The following note from Dr. Lambuth speaks for itself. We rejoice that Montana ranks among the first to meet her obligations.

It is with much sadness that we learn of the severe illness of our dear brother, Dr. John. It will be a great affliction to him to be compelled to desist from the work in which he is so deeply enlisted. The cause of missions lie very near his heart. Let earnest and inportunate prayer be made for his recovery. In the meantime, let the church hold up the hands of Dr. Lambuth, who is called to stand in the breach in the crisis that is upon us at this time. The work will not suffer in his hands. He is the embodiment of missionary fervor and activity. He says:

"Your letter of 14th, meets me on my return from Baltimore Conference. I echo your "Praise the Lord!" God bless the little Montana Conference! We are all hoping for some large remittances this week. I enclose you receipt.

Dr. John is dangerously ill, as you will see by his work in Nashville Advocate. We hope and pray. You will join your prayers with ours I know.

Yours cordially,
W. R. Lambuth".

Answers To Prayer.

Sometimes God, for wise reasons, may not answer our prayers at the time they are offered; he may defer an answer for weeks or months; but he is all this time drawing us out to make our supplications with greater arder, and more humility, and stronger faith. It is in love and mercy to us that he keeps us waiting for a while. It is that our desire for an answer may become more intense, and our perseverance more inflexible, and that the answer when it comes may exceed our expectations. While the blessing is being withheld, it is becoming more vast. While the mercies and favors are kept back, the store of them is increasing. While the heavenly rain is forbidden to descend, it is only preparing to come in more copious showers.

The sweetest and most blessed manifestations of the divine Presence are bestowed on those who are most importunate and persevering in their requests at the throne of grace. By continued and fervent prayer, by long and earnest talking with God, a condition of mind is obtained that is well-pleasing to God, so that he can bestow the blessing that is sought in perfect consistency with the administration of his government. To bestow a peculiarly great and rich blessing on one whose heart was not in a fit state to receive it, would be unwise—would be contrary to the laws of his spiritual kingdom. Before God can wisely bestow extraordinary benefits, the heart must be set on their attainment, the desires after them must become intensified, and the purpose must be fully formed never to rest until they are obtained; and this state of mind can only be secured by prayers of uncommon fervor and perseverance. The soul must be full of burning earnestness, and the flame of prayer must ascend continually to heaven.

Get into close connection with the living fountain—the fountain of life in Christ—and then you may be the means of conveying streams of the water of life to others. If full of love yourself, you will kindle love in others. If full of light, you will communicate light. If full of the Holy Spirit and of power, other minds and other hearts will be divinely influenced.—From "Pulpit Earnestness.

Wisdom's Warning.

Lesson Text.—Prov. 1:20-33.

Hints for the Primary Teacher.

BY FAITH LATIMER.

Proverbs.—We are to have several lessons from a book of the Bible called Proverbs, and in the first verse of the book called the Proverbs of Solomon. What is a proverb? It is a short saying, and usually a wise one. You have often heard such a proverb as this: "Waste not, want not." When your mother is trying to teach you to be orderly, does she say this wise proverb, "A place for everything, and everything in its place?" Bible proverbs are often a precept or direction to be obeyed, such as this: "Harken unto me, O ye children;" "Hear instruction, and be wise." Another is, "My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother." You know, nearly every Bible precept has a promise linked with it, so in this Book of Proverbs. We read there of a reward to those who obey father and mother, that wise obedience will be such an ornament to the life and character that it will be grace to the head and chains about the neck. In those days nothing could be more precious than gold chains for the head and neck,—costly ornaments worn by kings and those whom they would honor. Do you remember an old prophet who had been taken captive when a boy, and when he was old God helped him to read some strange handwriting on the wall? As a reward, the king had him dressed in scarlet or crimson like a king, and a chain of gold around his neck. A proverb was sometimes a likeness to something, like this one, "As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country;" or the saying, "Wisdom is better than rubies." Sometimes a proverb was in a picture like a parable such as Jesus used. Here is one: "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." See what few words can remind you of armies battling at the walls to get possession of a city. What is the name of the book we are beginning to study?

Proverbs of Solomon. Does it mean that Solomon wrote them all? We are told that Solomon "spoke three thousand proverbs," and that "he taught the people knowledge; that he sought out and set in order many proverbs." Why was Solomon so wise? Do you remember when he was young what he asked the Lord to give him? Perhaps he or some one else gathered up many of his wise sayings, and put them in this book with other proverbs which had been in use for a long time. There is so much in these proverbs to teach how to live, to be honest and true, patient, kind, what it is best to be and to do, that it used to be called the Wisdom book. Whoever wrote or collected the proverbs kept for us precious words for children to learn, easy words, little verses with great lessons in them. The book is full of kind words, often saying "my son," as if a good father spoke to his child. In the first verses we are told that these proverbs are to give knowledge to the young, and that the beginning of knowledge is the fear of the Lord.

Wisdom. There is a picture called wisdom, as if a beautiful, loving woman, a queen of all knowledge, stood in sight of everybody, calling aloud to all who would listen. The most public place in olden time was at the opening of the city gates; for all cities had walls around them, and at the gateways were seats and market-places, where the elders and people often met. There the judges came and held their court close by, and any news or word for all the people was spoken aloud by a crier or a watchman. So Jesus, who is the Word, came to earth; and he stood and cried on a great feast day, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink."

Words of Wisdom.—She called to the careless ones who could so easily be tempted to do wrong, those who forget God, and she called them simple ones. Then she called to the scornful, those who have begun to laugh at good things and at being good, who think it is smart to make fun of those who love the Bible and its words. Again, she cried to some who are yet more hardened, and called them fools because they hate knowledge,—that knowledge which is the fear of the Lord. She bade them turn from evil, to listen to her words, to be willing to hear and obey. So everywhere the Bible begs sinners to turn from sin and turn to God. So John the Baptist cried, "Repent," which means to turn. So Jesus preached, "Repent, and believe." Wisdom said, "I will pour out my spirit unto you, I will make known my words." To those who want to have true knowledge the Spirit will always be given. What is the promise to those who hunger and thirst after righteousness? Jesus promised the Spirit to teach all things, and help his disciples to remember and understand the words he had said to them.

Ye Refused—What did Wisdom ask her hearers to do? She waited. Some would not answer, would not turn from evil; some refused to hear or obey. Some mocked and laughed at the call. Are there any now who make light of calls to be wise and obey? Wisdom told them that the time would come when they would cry for her help. Too late, they would wish they had listened and been wise in time. Their punishment would come as a sudden storm of wind and tempest; then they would call and she would not answer, would not turn to them. Why? For they hated knowledge. They did not choose the fear of the Lord. Was Wisdom to blame? Whose fault was it? So Jesus gave a picture of the wise and foolish. Which one was like the man who built his house upon a rock? Could the storms hurt it? Where did the foolish man build his house? What happened to it when the storms came? Again Jesus told of a coming day when the wise who had loved and served him, those who came when he called, shall once more hear his blessed voice saying, "Come;" but to those who would not listen he will say the dreadful word "Depart." What is the meaning of our golden text? The Proverbs are not all warning.

A Promise—You will find in the book many a golden promise. Here is one of peace and rest for all who listen to Wisdom's voice. They need have no fright in storm, no fear of danger need disturb; for they shall dwell safely. Does this remind you of the One who said, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest," and whose last gift to his disciples was peace?—S. S. Times.

The Characteristics of God's Method.

1. A gracious method. Nobody buys salvation. It is the gift of God.

2. An impartial method. God is no respecter of persons, and he wills to save all, even the vilest and hardest of hearts.

3. A simple method. "I must say," wrote Dr. Chalmers to a friend, "that I never had so close and so satisfactory a view of the gospel salvation as when I have been led to contemplate it as a simple offer on the one side, and a simple acceptance on the other." Samuel Randall on his deathbed called John Wanamaker to his side and said: "John, make these two things clear to me. First, what are the conditions of becoming a Christian? Secondly, am I eligible?" "You know the conditions and that you are eligible," was Mr. Wanamaker's reply. "You have only to say, 'I will accept the conditions and trust.' " And Randall did so, and died a Christian, though he had neglected Christ for many years.

4. A prompt method.

5. A thorough method.

6. A reliable method. Luther says: "Once upon a time the devil said to me, 'Martin Luther, you are a great sinner and you will be dammed!' 'Stop! stop!' said I; 'one thing at a time. I am a great sinner, it is true, though you have no right to tell me of it. I confess it. What next?' 'Therefore you will be damned.' 'That is no good reasoning. It is true that I am a great sinner; but it is written, Jesus Christ came to save sinners; therefore I shall be saved! Now go your way.' So I cut the devil off with his own sword, and he went away mourning because he could not cast me down by calling me a sinner."

Every converted man is a new epistle fresh from the hands of God.

A Foolish Mother.

Crash! Bang! Little Tommy's fingers are caught in the door! A piercing scream brings mamma to the spot, who quickly releases the bruised fingers, and holds them closely against her cheek, saying: "Poor little boy! Poor baby! Naughty door for hurting Tommy! Tommy whip the door! There! So!"—striking it—"mean old door for hurting Tommy!"

Tommy is in too much misery, at first, to notice, but, as the pain begins to subside, he finds a wonderful relief in pounding the door, and all through the afternoon, whenever a twinge in the injured digits reminds him of it, he hurls his blocks at it, kicks it with his baby foot, or strikes it with all his puny might, shouting "Mean, nas'y old door!"

This is only one incident out of many continually happening, by which the mother is unconsciously cultivating her child's temper, and creating in him a spirit of vindictiveness.

Is it wise to teach him to blame inanimate objects for accidents which are probably the result of his own carelessness? Ten to one, Tommy will go through life blaming other people for his own failures, calling himself a victim of circumstances, or whining about his "luck."

A mother need not withhold her sympathy at such a time, but she can mingle with it a comfort of a different nature, that will be a help to the child—"Mamma's brave boy!" "Mamma's little man!" would have turned Tommy's thoughts in a very different direction.

The Things Which Cannot Be Shaken.

When the author of the Epistle to the Hebrew says, "the things which cannot be shaken will remain," he implies that there are some things which can be shaken and some things which cannot; that there are some things which remain and some things which do not; in other words, that there is in the Bible a changeable and transitory element, and an unchanging. This is a truth which must commend itself to every careful, candid, intelligent student of the Scriptures. There are some things which cannot be shaken, which have always been and always will be. The existence of God, the deity of Christ, the way of salvation through Christ alone, faith and repentance as the initial steps in the Christian life, regeneration by the Spirit, the Bible as a revelation to man, the distinction between right and wrong, all these are eternal and unchangeable as they always have been, so they always will be. It is not, we may with reverence say, in the power of God himself to make any change in these. It is not conceivable to us how God can make that wrong which is right, or that right which is wrong; how God can make it wrong to return kindness with greater kindness, or light to return kindness with injury.

The Leagal Status of Children, or their Relation to the Law of God in the Atonement.

Shortly after we had entered the ministry we asked an aged minister what the moral condition of children in the atonement was. He opened his reply bysaying: "Man could not have asked a knottier question in theology, my brother." But we were not so impressed, nor are we to-day. The relation of Adam's children to God's law in the atonement is so clearly set forth in His word that nothing could have concealed it from view, even in a preliminary investigation of it, but the doctrine of total corruption in Adam by his fall, and the imputation of his sin, or guilt, to his progeny, neither of which is true. The first of these doctrines in the nature of the fall cannot be sustained as a scriptural truth, to say nothing about the proof furnished by the effects of the fall against it. While to state the other is to refute it. Such a result of the fall would have involved the transfer of Adam's character to his children through the law of procreation, which cannot be entertained aspossible. If we know anything we know that character is not transferred, nor transferible, but made by each individual for himself or herself, hence its destiny. The effect and not the guilt of the fall could alone be visited upon Adam's face.

This we will try to illustrate by the use of the following figure which we have conceived as a means of encouraging this idea, about which so much confusion has gathered. Let us suppose that a fish by its own act puts itself out of the water which contains the conditions of its being, or its right relations to God as its Creator. Now if you will consider it a moral agent in this act, its guilt is easily seen as one of its legitimate results. And that the effects which is found, and which is visited upon it through the relations to its environments that it has reached by the transgression of law or of its normal relations, is another and quite different thing. Now let us suppose that this fallen fish produces a progeny in this unnatural relation to its true or pristine condition of life, and we shall see that such progeny is unavoidably involved in the consequences of this relation in which they were born, but having nothing to do whatever with the act or guilt that placed their being in this ruinous state. In this relation the parent being and its progeny would be visited with, and held under, judgment of condemnation, because their relations are alike abnormal and can but visit ruin upon both alike. Now from this stand-point of enlightened reason we can understand Paul when he says: "As by the offense of one, (Adam in the garden) judgment came upon all men unto condemnation,"—doomed to the effects of the abnormal relations in which they were born as Adam's children. And this is "the sin of the world" that the Lamb of God came to take away.

Now let us examine into the nature and extent of this state in which Adam's children were born, that we may understand the provision made for them in the atonement. To do this we must define what man was on trial for. If we would know the truth of any thing we should begin our investigation of it, at the beginning. And certainly at the fall, and in its nature is the beginning of the great fact of sin in connection with Adam's race. And the conditions of Adam's trial determines the nature and extent of his failure, beyond a doubt.

Let us see what these conditions were. To do this we will lay down the following axiom, the correctness of which none will doubt, to wit: The penalty of law, if the judge understands the law in the case, and if his sentence is a righteous one, comprising all the conditions contained in the law violated, is the true construction of that law. The judicial authority could no more go beyond, than it could fall below, this equalizing principle in meeting the requirements of government in this department thereof. Then in the penalty pronounced upon man by his God in the garden, after he had transgressed the law, that said, "in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt die," we shall have the true construction of the law and the nature and extent of man's failure thereunder.

Here is the penalty that vindicates that law: "Dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return." As this penalty can only be inflicted directly upon the body, or fleshy faculty of man's being, the nature of his fall is confined to the temporal relation of his life, and its extent to temporal death, as the body in man's being is all that could be reduced to "dust," under the action of this notable penalty. Then man was on trial for the immortality of his body and nothing more. Then the abnormal relations in which the fall placed it to its environments and its death are all the direct and radical effects of the fall upon man. Hence it is that the body, a co-ordinate faculty of man's moral being, is held in the fallen state, in total more disability under the law that it transgressed. And we shall notice upon further investigation into his state as a fallen being, that his soul and spirit, or "inner man," were incarserated morally in the body, or as Paul expresses it, they become "lawful captives," that is, captives by the transgression of law. This effect of the fall is indirect or incidental, which deprived man's soul and spirit, shutting them in to the now carnal, sense-conditions of life. Hence it is that when regenerated or born out of this moral imprisonment in the flesh, these faculties are directed by faith and not by sight, or sense, as faith is an attribute common to them both and distinct from the body. These powers in man's being were not deproved in the fall, as is thought, and which has so misled theologians in defining man's fallen state, but deprived, and hence man's redemption was possible.

Now, having found the nature and extent of man's fall let us see how the atonement releaves him. The first thing to be accomplished in the atonement is to establish a relation between man in his fallen, abnormal state and God, in which he stands in moral alienation from God. In this state man is held by satanic power and as force must be employed in the atonement as elsewere to overcome this force, and as force cannot be exercised only through relation in kind, God must attach himself to man's being, and in this relation exert a superior force to that which holds man in moral disability, and thus effect his release. This relation was established between man and God in the incarnation of God's Son, who was made "in the likeness of sinful flesh," being "born of a woman," and hence in the relations in which man was lost. He had a soul and a spirit, or inner man, and a body just as man had. Now, if His Soul and Spirit, that are morally imprisoned in the body, can, under all the force of temptation that Satan can exert upon them through the body that he holds in total moral disability, maintain their integrity, then a victory for these powers in man's being will be achieved over the fiesh, or "the lawful captives will be taken away," as the prophet said would be done in the atonement. That this was accomplished through the Son of Mary, it is only necessary to refer to the fact that He being tempted in all points like as we are, did not sin, or yield to temptation. With this view of the atonement and also of man's fallen state, as we have explained above, we can understand Paul when he says: "For what the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh (moral disability thereof), God sent His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh" (not innocent, you see) "and for sin," (a sacrifice or death to sin in the relation where the inner man was held in moral bondage) "condemned sin in the flesh," (give the inner man the dominance over it) "that the law might be fulfilled in us" (you see,) "who walk (now), not after the flesh" (as we did before), "but after the Spirit," thus delivered, which is not now directed by the lusts of the flesh, but by the law of God.

We can also understand Paul when he says: "Even so by the righteousness of one" (Jesus Christ in the atonement in that He never sinned) "the free gift" (release of the soul and spirit of Adam's race from moral imprisonment in the body, which release was the legitimate result of the unbroken integrity of these powers in Christ their representative) "came upon all men unto justification of life." Then the relation of the children to the law of God, is a justified one, just such a relation as the regenerate sinner sustains to it. "Except ye" (adults) "become as little children" (justified or innocent) "ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of Heaven," said the Master.

Theologians have reversed this divine order, and made regenerated man the standard to which the child must come by some unknown means, instead of the child in the atonement being the moral standard to which the adult sinner must come by regeneration in order to enter the kingdom of heaven. This way of infantile justification is the way out of which Paul told adult Israel that they had gone on their own account, and not born out, as we have been taught. The Savior said to the same class, "Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction and many there are that go in thereat." Not born therein as the doctrine of natural depravity teaches. All that are in the way of ruin have gone there through the "wide gate" of some relations to life, which have become carnal by the fall. Then all that the child needs to make its calling and its election sure is a conscious communion with God that will enable it to keep under the body, just what the regenerated adult needs and no more, nor no less.

"Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." The child's body is held in total moral disability, as is the adult Christian and this is all there is of "inbred sin" in either, and which in its very nature cannot be removed while either the child or the adult lives, for the sentence of death rests upon it, and hence the only remedy is the coercion of the body, or flesh, by the "inner man" that has been given the ascendency over it, or in a scripture phrase, to "offer it a living" (not a dead) sacrifice," as the second blessing theory requires. It is easy to see that the child being in the way of justification by virtue of the atonement, to "raise him up therein in the nurture and admonition" (caution against indulging the flesh) "of the Lord," that "When he is old he will not depart from it". Or, in other words, if we will raise him up in this way of justified life he will always be in it. Were we to teach our children this, their true relation to God's law, and help and encourage them in such religious exercises as they are capable of engaging in, and never lead them for one moment, to believe that in their tender age they can indulge the body, or gratify its lusts in any carnal amusements, and grow them up in this way, we should not find them in the theatre and shows and at gambling tables, horse races, ball rooms, base ball grounds, etc., but in the Church, meeting its sacred obligations and sharing its blessings, and augmenting its influence in saving the lost race of man.

FROM DR. LAMBUTH.

Nashville, Tenn., Mar. 29th, '93.

To the Bishops and Members of the Board of Missions:

Dear Brethren: It grieves me to say that Dr. John is critically ill. Though seized while attending District Conference, at Dickson, Tenn., he is now in his own home at Nashville where he receives every attention. May your prayers be poured out in behalf of this faithful man of God and his afflicted family.

There need be no uneasiness concerning the business of the office. The annual report is being prepared for the press and will be out in due time. The Estimate Committee will hold its meeting as usual. The April number of the "Missionary Reporter" has just been thrown off, and the issue for May is being provided for. The same is true of the "Sowers and Reapers."

With a thankful heart I give you the Statement of our Treasurer that the Regular Collections for the year ending March 31st will not fall short of the same for the previous year. This, in the face of almost universal shrinkage in values, and monetary stringency, is doing well.

Even though debt may not be entirely extinguished it is to be devoutly hoped that it will not be necessary to mention the matter after our annual meeting. Rather let us plan and press forward an educational campaign for Missions which shall culminate in an awakened conscience, a return of the Church to her first love, and a baptism of the Holy Ghost.

In view of Drafts to be signed, and other important demands of the office, the Board held a meeting yesterday and authorized me to act as Corresponding Secretary, pro tem.

With great diffidence, brethren, do I accept the responsibilities thus placed upon me, but leaning upon an omnipotent arm, and trusting in the Holy Spirit as an infallible counselor, I remain,

Yours respectfully,

W. R. Lambuth.

PARSONAGES FOR OUR WESTERN WORK.

When the Church projects a mission in this Western work, and sends a missionary, the first thing that should be done is the building of a parsonage. That should be the beginning of the work. There is nothing more important to start with. There is nothing that gives tone, character permanency to the effort of the Church in any mission-field like a good, comfortable home for the missionary. In point of importance as the beginning of mission-work it surpasses a church-house itself. All done before the building of a parsonage seems to be merely an experiment. At any time withdrawal is easy, and when difficulties arise the temptation to withdraw is very great. A parsonage affords not merely a home for the missionary—it is a home for the Church. The building of church-houses comes in much easier afterward. Nobody knows what our church has lost in this Western field by a failure along this line. Nobody knows the gain there may be to the Church when a home is provided. Without a parsonage the Church is crippled, the missionary is crippled, the work fails. This mission here illustrates: I have been here for more than a year without a home, suffering all sorts of inconveniences, like a muzzled ox treading out the corn, or a man with his arms bound behind him running a race. I am not disposed to complain about that, however, for I have undergone no hardship that the Father has not paid me for a hundred times over. Beides, the past year's experience will serve as a necessary drill for what is just before me. Anything endured for the sake of Christ's kingdom is a blessed experience that has in it its own reward. And besides, it is not so much the personal comfort of the missionary that is to be considered (of course that is a consideration), but the interest of the Church; and what I wanted to say is this, that since I have begun to gather material for building our parsonage and preaching-room here our work seems to be taking a deeper hold already. The first work done upon our parsonage lot was the setting of some posts for a fence. The Indians gathered around and asked what I was going to do. When I told them that I was going to build a house for the "medicine man" [preacher], and a house in which we could all worship the Great Father, they seemed to be pleased, and numbers of them have been to see me to talk about it. The whites also are interested. I shall be able to gather the scattered forces among them, for there are a few Methodists among the Government employes here. They are excellent, good people, and together we will accomplish good. The Church will be on a firm footing by the erection of this house. It is the beginning of a healthy growth—only the beginning, for it makes further growth possible. Now, in contrast with the above, look at Pawhuska, among the Osages. For lack of a parsonage that place had to be abandoned for the present, and by the time we make another effort to enter there it will be closed against us. I will not stop to comment, but merely to say that we often lose ground by a failure along this line. God's bles-

WASHINGTON LETTER.

A Presbyterian Administration. Certain publications announce in warning tones that there are five Catholic Senators in the new Congress and more than ever before. Among Government clerks here it is not an uncommon remark that Catholics have too much political influence. Maryland was largely settled by Catholics and from the earliest times, Baltimore, Georgetown, Alexandria and Washington have had a large population of that faith. It therefore quite naturally happens that a large percentage of appointments from this vicinity are of the same faith and there is nothing alarming in it. No one catalogues the Methodist, Baptist, or Congregationalist clerks or Senators. The Congregationalists are comparatively few in number, but there must be a dozen or more of them in the Senate while the Executive Department is run by Presbyterians. Cleveland, Stevenson, Gresham, Lamont and Smith all attend churches of that faith and if not all active members have wives who are in good and regular standing, and who will not let the Pope take possession during the next four years. Meanwhile Col. Totten and literalists and prophetic jugglers of numbers have disposed of the world and things in general!

Seven Millions free gold in the Treasury and offers of more re fused because of some trifling question of freight, abrasion of coin or the like does not look like a financial stampede. But the Treasury reports of exports and imports has a bad look. Last year we bought 32 millions more than we sold. During the last seven months of 1892, the imports of coffee, tobacco, rubber, cotton, wool, silk, steel and iron exceeded those of the same months in 1891 by fifty millions. During the same period exports fell off 120 millions. Europe holds large quantities of our public and private bonds that call for millions for interest. American tourists carry millions abroad. We are thus debtors to Europe. Solomon said the borrower is servant to the lender, and so he will be while debt and credit exist. If A wishes to buy or borrow of B they must agree on terms. Having agreed the creditor will insist on being paid. If we dislike paying Europe in gold we must stop running in debt. Poor Richard's maxim—a penny saved is a penny earned, may need more attention from the government and more particularly from the people. We send for food, drink and clothes per capital several times as much as the average old world nation Our sugar, coffee, whisky, beer and tobacco bills are without precedent.

Yankee Economy. Within 35 years the yankee farmer has seen the price of his farm and grain product reduced by a half or more, and largely through Government gifts of land to western settlers and railroads. Yet the little cheapened, stony, sidehill farm of New England lends to the broad, rich acres of Nebraska and Kansas. The New England farmer raises his own vegetables, grain, meat, butter, sugar and wool, lives well, spends little or nothing and has a surplus.

The New York, built at Cramp's ship yard, Philadelphia, proves to be the fastest armored vessel of the world, having a speed of about twenty-one knots. She has made preliminary trials and will soon submit to the Government tests and be accepted.

No Nepotism. President Harrison gave his brother Scott Harrison no office. The latter being a Democrat is now a candidate for the surveyorship of the port of Kansas City. There appears no reason why the present President should not appoint Harrison's brother though he officially ignores his own.

Standing Up for America.

A story is told in connection with Bishop Brooks' visit to England. He attended a certain lecture by an Englishman, who, having been for a few days in America, thought he knew it all. In the course of his remarks he made the statement that all American men were undersized.

Rising from his seat to his full height of six feet, two inches or so, Dr. Brooks stood and said, "I am an American." In another part of the room was Dr. McVickar, rector of Holy Trinity, Philadelphia. He is even taller than Dr. Brooks was. He, too, arose and remarked that he was an American.

The audience was preparing to shout, when a third man, still taller and still an American, followed the lead of the two divines. Then the audience fairly howled and what became of the lecturer deponent saith not.

Mohammedanism and Christianity A Contrast.

CHARLES GORE, IN GREAT THOUGHTS.

The standard of Mohammedanism, by contrast to Christianity, may be described as a standard deliberately adapted to the average moral level of the men to whom it was meant to appeal. "If one had to express in a short compass," says a very discerning writer (Mozley), "the character of its remarkable founder as a teacher, it would be that that great man had no faith in human nature. There are two things which he thought man could do and would do for the glory of God, transact religious forms, and fight; and upon these two points he was severe; but within the sphere of common practical life, where man's great trials lies, his code exhibits the disdainful laxity of a legislator who accommodates his rule to the recipient, and shows his estimate of the recipient by the accommodation which he adopts.....The writer of the Koran does, indeed, if any discerner of hearts ever did, take the the measure of mankind;" that is, the measure of men, on the average, whom he came in contact with, and he legislates accordingly. 'Human nature is weak," he said.

It is this spirit of moral accommodation which has made Mohammedanism at once so successful among its votaries in securing conformity to its rules, and also so destitute of really progressive power. The method of Christ is in striking opposition. He, before Mohammed, said, "The flesh is weak;" but from the starting-point of this acknowledgment he proceeds by a quite different path. No book exhibits so profound a contempt for majorities, so startling a refusal to consider the conditions of success on the average, as the New Testament. Jesus Christ makes his appeal to the best; upon the selected disciples he spends his efforts; for them he prays; them he trains in his own school as the nucleus of a redeemed humanity, to act upon the world as "salt," or "light," or as a "city set upon a hill;" that is, as a body acts, the savor or appearance of which is distinct, emphatic, unmistakable. So the Christian Church in the world is to be a body coherent, based upon distinctive principles, exhibiting a striking and emphatic ideal. It is to be in the world and not of it, making its impression by its very distinctiveness; "that men might, by the good works which they should behold, glorify God," if not in the days of worldliness and prosperity, yet at least "in the day of visitation.

GLEANINGS.

God only knows how blessed he could make us if we would but let him.—Macdonald.

God liveth with the humble in spirit, but withdraweth his presence from the proud heart.

When you arise in the morning, form a resolution to make the day a happy one to a fellow-creature.

The more God empties your hands of other works, the more you may know he has special work to give them.—Garrett.

Just take hold of the first thing that comes in your way. If the Lord's got anything bigger to give you, he'll see to it.—A. D. T. Whitney.

Don't take up everything. The Lord seldom gives one great, outside mission; he never gives half a dozen at a time.—Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney.

God takes men's hearty desires and will instead of the deed, when they have not the power to fulfill it, but he never took the bare deed instead of the will.

Riches in their acquisition bring pain and suffering, in their loss manifold trouble and sorrow, in their possession a wild intoxication. How can we say that they confer happiness?

We can only do a deed to God by doing that deed for him—only by offering ours as the hands with which it shall be done. Our human love for one another, and all our human help, is not less his for being ours. "God's tender mercy" is the name in heaven for what we call on earth "a drink of water." Many dear things of Providence he hands to his little ones by each other. Sometimes how can he reach them else? And sometimes whom can he use but you and me?—Rev. W. C. Gannett.

——o——

"Can two walk together except they be agreed?" This is just another way of saying, "they cannot." They must be agreed first: then they walk together. This holds good of any two; and it is primarily true of God and the saint. So long as there is anything standing between God and me, it is simply impossible to walk with Him. God Himself asks the question, How can it be done? Let this be a settled matter; and it will save a deal of darkness and failure. Am I content to take God's thought about Christ?—About His word—about corrupt self—about the world—about my place in it, or rather outside of it, in Christ the risen, though the rejected One? If so, we walk together, for we are agreed. If not, how can we walk together?

The Flock Came Out Ahead.

A belligerent immersionist preacher by the name of Wolf was infesting the revival services of a Methodist pastor, also on the borders of Missouri. Upon the Sunday morning in question Mr. Wolf was on hand early, with the manifest intention of forcing a debate. The pastor, however, was equal to the occasion. Rising to his feet he commenced to read the opening hymn. The congregation delighted heard as follows

Jesus great Shepherd of the sheep,
To thee for help we fly;
Thy little flock in safety keep,
For, O, the Wolf is nigh.

Us into thy protection take,
And gather with thine arm;
Unless the fold we first forsake,
The Wolf can never harm.

This was more than Mr. Wolf could stand. He at once left the house pursued by the laughter of the entire congregation.—Central Christian Advocate

THE BOARD OF MISSIONS.

The Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South, will hold its annual session this year at Kansas City, Mo., commencing the fifth of May. This body has charge of the Foreign Missions, and of all others under the care of the M. E. Church, South, not provided for by the annual conferences. It consists of a president, vice-president, three secretaries, and twenty-five managers, who are elected quadrennially by the General Conference. The treasurer is elected by the Board. The bishops of the church and the treasurer are ex-officio members of the Board.

At the annual meeting a full attendance of all the members is expected. The reports of the secretaries and treasurer are made, the condition and needs of the work in all the mission fields, both in our own country and in foreign lands, are carefully considered, and appropriations are made for these fields for the ensuing year.

It is well known that our "western work" including the Western, Denver, New Mexico, Northwest Texas, West Texas, Montana, East Columbia, Columbia, Pacific, and Los Angeles conferences is sustained in part by the general church acting through this Board. The country lying all along the western frontier of our great land, stretching from Puget Sound to the Rio Grande, is filling rapidly with enterprising people who greatly need the Gospel, but are not able to support it. The people, in many cases, are our own children, and have claims upon us that we cannot disregard. Many of them are poor, as they are just now securing homes and starting in business. But they are intelligent and enterprising; the country is large and abundant in resources, and if properly cultivated, the field will in future yield gratifying results in precious jewels won for the Master's crown and in treasures with which to send the "glad tidings" still farther into the "regions beyond." It is natural that our people who are on the ground and see the needs of the work and the great opportunities for growth should appeal to the home-church for help. For many years they have felt that their claims were not properly understood by the majority of our leading men in the East and South. But they have had the satisfaction of seeing numbers of our "bishops and other clergy" who came and saw for themselves, acknowledge their error and become earnest advocates for the claims of the West. After long waiting, they see the tide gradually turning in their favor, and knowing that the limited resources at the disposal of the Board to-day is all that keeps it from doubling its appropriations and the forces employed by it in all our western fields.

The holding of the annual meeting at Kansas City—farther West than ever before held— we take to be an auspicious omen. The debt that has been such a burden is almost gone, and soon the Board will begin to enlarge its operations. Its members will get to breathe our pure western air, behold the wonderful energy displayed by our people, and feel the thrill of life that pulsates in western veins. They will see whereunto the work at Kansas City, which but a short time since, comparatively speaking, was a mission station, has grown. They will find that in contributing to missions in the West, they are doing double work—preaching the Gospel to those who are in need, and also strengthening the work in foreign fields. The great Bible Training School at Kansas City, the pride of the entire church, stands in sight of where former mission stations stood, where white men and Indians once mingled their tears and their shouts together, and it was born of the munificence of one who was once a home missionary—Rev. Nathan Scarret. Here in Montana, the veteran Stateler, who has spent his life as a missionary in western fields, much of the time conducting the warfare at his own charge, whose calls for a quarter of a century have been coming up to the church as "the voice of one crying in the wilderness; prepare ye the way of the Lord," and who has backed his calls by his heroic efforts and the hard earned savings of himself and his now sainted wife, which have been freely spent to help forward the work here, now offers to send a missionary to Japan and support him out of his own funds during his life. One of the most thrilling scenes we ever witnessed was in a Southern Methodist church in one of our Mission Conferences, where sixty white Christians, men and women, young and old, sat side by side with as many heathen Chinese, and taught them of Jesus and his love. It stirred us most deeply, for we saw in it the possibility and prophesy of our Western work. These are only a few instances out of many—only the first fruits of missionary work in the West. The church will not, it cannot, ignore them.

The success that has attended our ministry the past year, where the work is efficiently manned, is most gratifying, and will doubtless have its weight with the Board of Missions. Success in the West is not gauged so much by geographical boundaries (and we are heartily sorry that there is anything in our name that intimates such a thing or raises such a question) as genuine godliness and courage and persistence in urging it upon the people. Revivals have been almost if not quite, as numerous and fruitful in Montana, Idaho, and Washington, in proportion to there forces employed by our church, as in Missouri or Mississippi.

True, many of our preachers and people who have stood long on these western outposts have had much to try their faith and their patience. Some of them have spent all their possessions and have grown gray hoping against hope, working and waiting on what seemed to them the slow motions of the mother church—waiting for the dawning of the auspicious day that is now upon us. They have been cast down, but not destroyed, perplexed, but not in despair. They have been pained at witnessing so many promising fields once open to us pass into the hands of others who were more ready to cultivate them than we were. But there is much to be thankful for. There is much ground yet to be possessed. The toiling through the long night has not been in vain. Surely the Master is on board our little ship. Perhaps we are freer from pride, and better prepared to heed his command. "Launch out into the deep and let down the net for a draft" than if all our hopes had been realized in the past. Anyhow, we thank God and take courage. May the Board of Missions do better for Montana and the Northwest than ever before, and may we do more valiantly for Christ. Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward. It is better farther on.

HERE AND THERE.

Our readers will be pleased to see another excellent article from the active and facile pen of Rev. S. W. Cope. Though a superannuated preacher, we rejoice that he can use the pen so well. He also possesses gifts as a composer of metrical poetry. Before us is one of his productions, entitled, "The Three Graces"—Faith. Hope and Charity—set to music. There are five verses, and all on one page about the size and style of triumphant songs. The words are excellent, and the music appears to be good, though we have not heard it sung or played. Price 5 cents a copy. Address Rev. S. W. Cope, Chillicothe, Mo.

Rev. Dr. W. M. Leftich, of Nashville, Tenn., has been conducting protracted meetings in several of our churches in Savannah, Ga., and good results have followed his labors. The doctor is wide-wake, up with the times, versatile, cultivated, and yet old fashioned and orthodox in his notions concerning Methodist doctrine and experience.

The Nashville "Christian Advocate" devoted a full page editorial to the memory of the late Dr. Wiley. The numerous testimonials that are coming up from all parts of the church give evidence of the high esteem in which he was held. A great and useful man has gone to his reward.

Our work seems to be moving on well at Weston, Oregon. This is one of the oldest towns of Eastern Oregon, but it is taking a fresh start at the prospect of a new State Normal School building, and is to have electric lights. Brother Fancher, our pastor, there, is determined to keep our church abreast of the times in every good work. We wish him great success. We remember with pleasure our short visit to Weston and Athena last fall.

Rev. P. L. Stanton is the live presiding elder of Santa Barbara District, Los Angeles Conference. In speaking of the District Conference and Sunday School Conference on his district he says, in the Pacific Methodist Advocate: "During both conferences there will be preaching during the day at 11 a. m., and in the evening, and it is to be hoped that the preaching is to be done only by those who are anxious—tremendously anxious—to save souls. If any preacher has what he regards as a very fine sermon he will please leave it at home.

We will have no time to see anybody 'show off. Let us begin now to pray daily for the descent of the Holy Ghost. Let us come together with one accord. We should not be satisfied with anything less than a glorious, soul-saving revival."

"There is entirely too much effort at fine preaching—too much "showing off"—at many of our conferences, which accounts largely for so few revivals on such occasions.

Bishop Keener's natural force as a writer has not abated. He recently contributed an article to the Nashville Advocate entitled, "Shall we lose our children?" which has been extensively copied and commented upon by the religious press,, North and South. It has made a profound inpression, and will do much to stir the church to a sense of the danger that confronts it. He draws the picture of one million Methodists going to church and half a million children going from church every Sunday morning, and thinks that if children are made to attend church when they are young they will go of their own accord when they are old. We think so too.

Chicago was defeated in its desperate effort to have the World's Fair opened on Sunday, and has proposed to get even with the country by the election of a man for mayor who appears to be a stench in the nostrils of morally-disposed people. It means that all the places of infamy in Chicago are to be opened on Monday and every other day and that the devotees of Bacchus are to hold high carnival there, with none to molest or make afraid. Although the mayor was nominated by the democrats yet every democratic paper in the city, we learn, opposed him, but one. But the devil jumps too high some times, and the city of Chicago will sue the folly of such action in the end. "The wages of sin is death." This is true in municipal as well as in individual life.

From all that we can learn, we are having better weather in Bitter Root Valley than in any other portion of the Northwest. We have had no snow to speak of for a month or more, and the stock have been on the range making their own living for several weeks, while the farmers are busy putting in their crops. But the spring is very late. The mountains are white with snow, which comes down to the foothills. The ground is full of moisture, and a good season is anticipated. The fruit crop bids fair to be better than ever before in this region.

Rev. A. Y. Skee writes from Hesseltine, Wash., April 8th, as follows:

Our winter is slowly giving way. There is lots of snow. Sleighs are still running on the "ridge." We have had some good meetings, gathered up some of the subscriptions in sight for our church at Edwall—$705.00 altogether. I think we can build there and pay out this fall.

Concerning our church in Wilbur: the winter has been so hard that most of the people have fed out their seed grain, thus making hard times harder. Some subscriptions we have failed to collect, so that with 18 per cent. interest to pay on our debt we are further behind than I figured. We will have to have help from the Board if we pay out. Our property is worth $1,600.

Bishop Key orders his paper changed from Fort Worth, Texas, to Sherman, Texas, which we take it is to be his residence. He was married April 5th to Mrs. L. A. Kidd, president of the North Texas Female College. Two years ago we were very much disappointed in not having Bishop Key to preside over our conference. We trust that his colleagues will arrange for him to come to us in the near future. He is full of the Holy Ghost and of faith, and his ministry is greatly blessed. We wish him great joy.

President Archibald A. Jones, of Central Female College, Lexingiton, Mo., writes: "Our school, thus far, has enjoyed a most successful year; the number of boarders enrolled to date is 113, the total enrollment being about 180 pupils."

We rejoice at this good news, for this is one of the best colleges for young ladies to be found in the West. See the advertisement and send for a catalogue.

The "American Sabbath" is an excellent periodical. It is the organ of the American Sabbath Union. The March number contains some excellent articles on Sunday closing of the World's Fair, and also some excellent portraits of leading divines of the United States. Subscription price 50 cents a year. Single copies, 10 cents.

Though the name of God is not mentioned in the book of Esther, yet the reader is filled with a sense of the presence and over-ruling power of Jehovah from beginning to end. The word character is not in the Bible, yet the great object of the Bible is the development of right character. The people who have come the nearest our ideal of perfect holiness in this world never professed anything more than to be humble followers of the Lord Jesus. But there went out from them a hallowed spiritual influence that impressed and won others to Christ. God counts more on possession than profession. There is no objection to saying "Lord, Lord," if we "do" the Father's will.

FROM GENESEE, WASH.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—

Moved again! How true it is that here we have no abiding place!

We arrived two weeks ago and were received with open hearts and in open homes. Our immediate needs have been satisfied and future contingencies provided for. The outlook is promising, though not unshadowed by difficulties; yet in the good providence of God we hope to achieve victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. In our efforts here we doubt not that we will be ably seconded by a corps of able, living members. Sure we are of this hearty co-operation and loyal support if our flattering reception is to be taken as an index.

Thanks to Brother Robertson for the noble work he did here during his short stay, and many similar or greater blessings attend his efforts in his new field. Come, Mr. Editor, to our District Conference,

Genesee, Idaho.

Neglected Opportunities.

BY ARTHUR W. KELLEY.

Some nations have been noted for their prosperity, not so much because of their natural resources as because of the thrift of the people. Many a business has suddenly become a mine of wealth through the discovery of a way of using what had before been wasted. More fortunes, perhaps, have been built on strict economy than on large incomes. Many a life has owed its wonderful usefulness, not to great genius or advantages, but to conscientious improvement of slight opportunities. Many a life is barren of results simply because of neglected opportunities. Many of the world's wants could be satisfied by the world's waste.

It is not necessary that an opportunity should be a great one. Larger spheres do not always mean larger usefulness or greater faithfulness. Not very long ago the church was praying most earnestly that the way might be opened for the gospel to certain lands; now that prayer has been answered; there is constantly occasion to urge the church to take advantage of the opening. There is to-day great and praiseworthy anxiety to reach the masses, while some that seem most earnest may be overlooking the individuals that make up the masses. When one's sphere is limited, there may be the best opportunity for the intensity of one's influence to appear. It may not be our lot to save a nation's life, but we may do something towards it by saving some that make up the nation.

Every occupation, every time of life, has its peculiar advantages in the way of opportunity. The pastor has his opportunity; but he may often long for the frank and natural confession and confidence that one clerk or workman may receive from his fellow, bringing with it the chance for the fit word in season. The boy and girl in school are in some ways closer to their mates than is any one else, closer than they themselves can ever be again. They may learn later how to use words that are wiser and more well chosen; but the words may then have to enter ears that are not so ready to listen. To-morrow may bring a different, possibly a better opportunity; it will not repeat to-day's.

Perhaps we need a new definition of opportunity. We may have thought it brought a time when it was easy to do a thing. If that were so, Esther had no opportunity, fewer did have an opportunity to do anything worth doing. An opportunity is a time when any thing can be done in Christ's strength. It may seem hard to decide for Christ now, but the opportunity is now, and it is certain that the decision will never be more easily made. It may not be easy to confess him or to act for him now, but to neglect it now will make it only the harder the next time.—Golden Rule.

The Value of Wisdom.

LESSON TEXT.—PROV. 3:11-24.

The Lesson Story.

By Cunningham Geikie, D, D., LL. D.

Heavenly Wisdom, which is represented in the first chapter of Proverbs as no less marked by a love of openness and appeal to the reason and conscience of men than its opposite for secrecy and darkness, stands in the second chapter in the places of chief concourse in the city, warning the foolish and counseling the irresolute. Her hands are uplifted in her earnest appeals, and her whole bearing like that of the noblest of prophets, who pleaded in the same way with their generation in the streets and open places at the city gates.

The ruin of life by folly is the burden of the first chapter. The benefits of Wisdom, in every relation of man to God or his fellows, are recounted in the second. Everything depends on the sincerity of our desire to know her counsels and our inflexible continuance in obeying them. We must incline our ear, apply our heart, cry after knowledge of her, seek her as men seek for silver or for hidden treasures; and only when we do so will she be found. For true wisdom is the gift of God. To him who obtains it, Jehovah becomes a shield from folly and a guide in the ways of uprightness. Wisdom gives discretion and understanding, which will guard him who has them from the snares of the worthless of both sexes. Without wisdom, man's path leads to "the shades;" with it, is life. While the sinner dies, the upright shall dwell alive in the land. As to the wicked, they shall be cut off, and transgressors shall be rooted out (v. 22).

Hitherto the voice of Wisdom has sought to arm the young man against the seductions of evil associates by painting the calamities that such "folly" brings on him. In the third chapter she goes on to show, with more detail, the attractions of the path which she invites us to tread, at once in itself and in its fruits. True wisdom, cries she, besides all worldly benefits it secures, brings also the priceless honor of high favor with God. But it must never be forgotten that the only wisdom he recognizes is that which springs from a sincere religiousness. This, however, will give him who has it long life, and quiet from fear of evil. He who values the two graces, kindness (that is, love), and absolute truthfulness, enjoined by wisdom, binding them like golden chains round his neck, and also writing them on the tables of his inmost soul, will find favor with God and man.

The mention of these two divine powers, love and truth, calls forth an exhortation to seek only that wisdom which rests on the fear of God, since mere worldly prudence is not enough. But this can only be done if we give up all confidence in ourselves, and lean on the wisdom that comes from above,—if we acknowledge our need of heavenly guidance in all our paths, and, while thus fearing Jehovah, resolutely turn away from all evil. To him who acts thus, such "wisdom" will be a blessing beyond thought. "It will be medicine to his flesh and refreshment to his bones" (8). He who identifies himself in such a way with God will naturally honor him with his substance, and with the first fruits of all his increase (9); words which may either mean, generally, the exercise of a generous liberality in all that promotes good among men, or, possibly, the careful payment of tithes and first fruits ordered by the law. These, however, are not elsewhere mentioned in the whole book, apparently as too formal and priestly; and therefore it may be better to think of the wide virtue of beneficence to man at large, than only of payments to the clergy, though no man that fears God will be wanting in due care of his public servants.

To such generous bounty there is promised the richest acknowledgment from above. The barns of him who shows it will be filled with plenty, and his presses will stream over with new wine (10). It needs hardly be said, however, that everything depends on the motive of our good works. To be generous in the belief that it is only an investment at high interest, with God for security, makes the whole a mere trick of sordid selfishness, which can bring no blessing. To give for love, hoping for nothing again, is very different.

Yet we are not in any case to count on worldly prosperity, however sincere we may be in our fidelity to God (11). Chastisement may be sent, even though Jehovah recognizes us as his sons. As the old Puritans used to say, we can never tell God's heart from his hand. To be afflicted, Wisdom assures us, may, indeed, be a sign of our heavenly sonship; "for whom Jehovah loveth he correcteth; even as a father the son in whom he delighteth." That our chastisement should be called "correcting" in itself is consoling; for "to correct" means "to make right,"—not the implying that we were previously altogether wrong, as might be said of those set on evil, but as the putting into the straight road again those who for the moment had lost it. Eliphaz was right in saying to Job much the same as Wisdom says to her audience, though he drew a wrong inference from even so consolatory a truth, in the case of the patriarch (Job 5 : 17-18). It seems, indeed, to have been a widespread conviction through age after age; for we have it here in Proverbs, which reflects the ideas of the days after Solomon. Eliphaz shows that it was familiar beyond Israel; for he was from Teman, in Edom, and therefore one of another race than the Hebrew. The author of the Ninety-fourth Psalm, the date of which is very late, repeats it. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes it; and is reproduced once more by John the Divine in the Revelation (Job 5 : 17; Psa. 94 : 12; Heb. 12 : 5 6; Rev. 3 : 19).

A fresh eulogium on Wisdom now begins: (13.) "Well is it for the man who has found wisdom, and for the man who wins understanding; for to gain her is better than to gain silver, and there is more profit in having her than in having fine gold. She is more precious than the costly red coral or pearls. All the things thou prizest most are not to be compared with her. (16.) Length of days is in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor. Her ways are ways of sweet delight, and all her paths are peace. (18.) She is a very tree of life to them that make her theirs, and happy is every one who holdeth her fast. (19.) So great and glorious, indeed, is she, that she was the helper of Jehovah in his founding the earth and preparing the heavens. By his having Wisdom in an infinite measure he broke up the floods, so that part sank into the channels he had made for it, and became the ocean; and part floated overhead, to be the storehouse and mother of dew."

Having thus exalted the glories of the truly wise, a new exhortation to the "son" to seek this priceless blessing is begun: (21.) "My son, keep fast hold of sound wisdom and discretion, and never let them out of thy sight; for thus they will be life to thy soul and grace to thy neck [as if it were adorned with chains of gold, Prov. 1 : 9]. Then thou shalt walk in thy way safely, and thy foot shall not stumble. When thou liest down, thou shalt not be afraid; yea, thou shalt lie down, and thy rest shall be sweet."—S. S. Times.

The Protestants of the world number about 137,000,000, says James Croll, of Montreal, and may be classified approximately as follows:

Lutherans	35,000,000
Methodists	25,000,000
Episcopalians	22,000,000
Presbyterians	20,000,000
Baptists	17,000,000
Congregationalists	6,000,000
All other denominations	12,000,000

—Missionary Review of the World.

SELIM EL-HAKEEM, a native pastor at Hasbeya, Mount Hermon, sends a most touching appeal to the Christian Medical Mission Association of England, pleading for a physician. The distance to Damascus, Beyout, and Palestine is so great and the expense so high that the great majority are too poor to have medical attention.

A resident and christian worker in Austria, in a letter to one of the editors, tells of some of the difficulties and successes of work in that land.

"We have very little opportunity for using English tracts and books, but we are greatly in need of gospel literature in the German language. From the enclosed little report (private), you will see what we are trying to do, amidst many difficulties and restrictions in a land where tract distribution, as it is carried on in England and America, is PROHIBITED. However, we find many ways of circulating the truth without colliding with the laws, and could scatter much more good seed, if we only had the means to do so.

Many publications which are most useful in England and America, are quite unintelligible to our poor Austrians, as they presuppose much Bible knowledge, whereas, here most people have never SEEN a Bible, and even the Protestants are so ill-instructed that it frequently happens that people who have been baptized and confirmed in the Lutheran church, seek the Psalms among the Epistles, or the Gospels among the Prophets. This ignorance our Bible-readings are doing much to disperse, but as you will see from our booklet there are great spaces of land without any Bible readings or pastors or any thing else in the way of gospel teaching. To these we send as many packets as we can muster, and as frequently as possible. At present we have scarcely anything on our shelves."

The writer of the above letter, with others, is engaged, and has been for ten years, in a very difficult but needy work and with gratifying success. Large numbers attend the private Bible readings and much evangelical literature is scattered in various ways, and "loan-libraries" established in a number of villages, where books go from hand to hand and house to house.

These people are most highly commended for their christian courage and good judgment amidst many difficulties. It is a work too, which appeals strongly to every Protestant and lover of religious freedom. For obvious reasons we cannot publish either the name or place of labor, but if any feel moved to offer any help to these workers in Rome's darkness, it may be sent to either of the editors and every cent will be forwarded to the persons in charge, who like Paul, live in their own hired house and the work is sustained by voluntary subscriptions.

——o——

"Can two walk together except they be agreed?" This is just another way of saying, "they cannot." They must be agreed first: then they walk together. This holds good of any two; and it is primarily true of God and the saint. So long as there is anything standing between God and me, it is simply impossible to walk with Him. God Himself asks the question, How can it be done? Let this be a settled matter; and it will save a deal of darkness and failure. Am I content to take God's thought about Christ?—About His word—about corrupt self—about the world—about my place in it, or rather outside of it, in Christ the risen, though the rejected One? If so, we walk together, for we are agreed. If not, how can we walk together?

A MODEL OF A GOOD CITIZEN.

In looking over the history of the ages, dispensations, and generations of the past, I find many worthy examples to all classes of mankind. Examples of bravery, heroism, and fidelity in times of war; of courage, endurance, and faithfulness even unto death, in times of religious persecutions; of honesty, justice, and integrity in legislators, judges, and governors. But to give an example of loyalty in the subjects of civil government, is the principal object of the present writing. There are many such models, correct, true, good; every way worthy of imitation. I have selected one from among the best, eminent, inspiring, ennobling. For the present we withhold the name, as that is not important to our purpose. The name is however significant, meaning: "God is my judge." But we are dealing in character now, with one who excelled in many characteristics and virtues, such as adorn and beautify any rank or position in life. In childhood and youth he was moral, upright, a devout worshiper of the true God. No specific mention is made of his civil duties and conduct, during these early periods of his life. That he was loyal to his government no one can doubt, who believes the facts as I have given them. This type of young manhood always makes good citizens. This is a significant fact that ought to be pondered well, by the individual, the family, the church and the whole country. In the ratio that good boys are multiplied, we shall have a pure ballot, and good government. But in moralizing I must not lose sight of the hero of my subject.

At the age of about twenty years, he and many of his countrymen were taken captive, and carried away to a strange and foreign land. The laws and customs of this idolatrous people were very different from those of his native country. But he soon adjusts himself to his new surroundings, and in a way that gives him favor with all the people. His character and conduct, gentleness of spirit and subordination to constituted law, attracts the attention and gains the confidence of the civil rulers. They find in him the promise of great ability and great usefulness to the government. He has a sound constitution, a sound mind and judgment; superior knowledge, wisdom, and understanding. He has a correct and extensive intelligence of men, and of the current events of the day. But it is necessary that he should know "the language, and the sciences peculiar that people." To this end he is to put under a course of special training for a term of three years, with able teachers and other necessary helps. This was as much to him, as a university course could be to a young man of our time and country.

During these years of labor and trials, he was an orderly student, and a well behaved citizen. He observed every law, except one that was in violation of his conscience, involving a matter of right and duty between himself and his God. He was required to eat the flesh of beasts that had been strangled and first offered as victims to their gods. His God, his religion, and his conscience would not allow him to commit so great a sin. On the statement of these facts to the proper authorities, he was promptly and cheerfully excused from the observance of this rule.

After this course of preparation he was admitted to the highest court of the land. Here he found himself in the midst of the corruptions of great wickedness. "But he preserved his virtue and integrity inviolate, and no danger or temptation could divert him from the worship of the true God." In all this the Christian, as well as the citizen, may find a good example; one of great dignity, and worthy of all acceptation. After that the government had proved him and found him worthy, he is invested with the honors and responsibilities of office. Here he shows himself loyal and trustworthy, as he had done while he was a private citizen. Faithful in a few things, he is made ruler over many things. He rises step by step until he reaches situations of the greatest rank and power in the empire, save that of the king himself.

It is scarcely necessary to tell the reader, that these are the facts as recorded in the history of Daniel the Hebrew captive. To me it would be a great pleasure to pursue the subsequent history of Daniel, but I cannot do so now. His example is one of merit, based on moral right. On this foundation rests his loyalty as a citizen, and his fidelity while in office. There are a few examples in profane history, that might be safely followed. But the best examples, and those most worthy every way, in every department of civil government, and of human society as well, are to be found recorded in sacred history. Those who go to the Bible for example find the best; such as are nearest perfect, true, correct, and such as are most helpful every way, and in every thing.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, D. C.,
April 11th, 1893.

WHISKEY vs. MILK:—

A few years ago a young man was driving a milk cart in this city for wages. He was energetic, industrious, ingenuous, and in a few months became a milk merchant. His business grew and he erected a building to accommodate it. He bought milk for miles along the railroads coming into the city and in the surrounding country and Frank Ward's retailing milk wagons could be seen on every street. His establishment, however, annoyed fashionable neighbors who drove him out. But he built again in the center of business a larger establishment and combined with it a dairy lunch room, then a new thing at the Capitol, though scores have sprung up since. Ward thus prospered would have become a millionaire, but he drank. He began to neglect his business and his family. He was jolly, generous, reckless and sometimes wildly drunk. Harpies followed him as wolves a wounded buffalo. In drinking about two or three years since he shot a man, was tried and acquitted, and then set up in business again by friends. But he could not let whiskey alone, and gamblers, whiskey peddlers, thieves, pickpockets, bloodsuckers, male and female, stuck to him as sharks follow the floating carcass of a dead whale. His affairs went badly. Friends were aleinated. His wife sued for divorce. Finally hope forsook him. One night last week after filling up with drink he threw himself or fell under a car and was killed. If poor Ward had patronized only a lunch dairy he might to-day have been a leading man in local business circles and the head of a happy family.

BLOOD AND WHISKEY.

The amount of blood that flows out of Washington liquor saloons is astonishing. Scarcely a stabbing or shooting scrape that does not occur in a saloon or come straight from it. Is it a murder? Some one had been drinking. Is it a suicide? Whiskey was in it. Is it about a woman? Well, there was drinking also. Is it a man beaten to death, drowned, frozen, run over? Nine times out of ten drink did it. Drink stumbles in front of the engine, neglects to close the gate, or turn the switch, or flag the train, or guard the fire; drink fumbles with the loaded pistol, plays with the razor, handles a bludgeon and mixes speedy poisons. And it is said that they don't even hang a man here without getting him half drunk! But we started out to say something of milk.

Pure MILK is scarce. Analyses by the city chemist of lots selected here and there show that they are robbed of cream, diluted with water, colored with annatto and thickened with, who knows what? Dealers sell both milk and cream and so make extraordinary profit. It is done by allowing the milk to stand a few hours and then pouring off the top which is sold as cream, the residue being colored and doctored and passed off as milk. This is the stuff we take with oat meal and feed to babies and invalids. Are butter and cheese colored also? Butter and cheese made on the farm in winter are ordinarily white. How is it that now we buy butter evidently winter made of rich golden yellow? Is it colored by corn and carrots fed to the cows, by annatto, or by what?

CHRISTIAN OLD AGE.

It is a mark of advanced civilization to venerate the character and honor the teachings of hoary age. It is a circumstance most favorable to the stability and glory of civil government to make ripe experience, rather than immature judgment, the controlling power in legislation. He who has grown to manhood without the wise counsel of age, has lost that which neither the knowledge nor treasure of after years can supply. This is true in the highest sense, when the counsels of age are regulated by the principles and sanctifying grace of the gospel. The aged pilgrim, bending beneath the weight of years, yet pressing toward the mark of his high calling, is a royal personage among men. His hoary locks are woven into a crown more kingly than the glittering diadem of empire; a crown of glory, the eternal sign of manliness tried in many a conflict, of virtue in its supremacy, of wisdom enriched by the years of discipline and observation of the world.

Old age has its disabilities. At this period of life the dearest earthly friends are gone. At the morning and evening meal stands the vacant chair. Companionship ordained of heaven may have been smitten by the fell destroyer, and the future walk is one of comparative loneliness. Children are far away, battling in the conflicts of life, or have been translated to the unseen world. A new generation is coming upon the the stage, most of whom are unable to appreciate the labors endured, and the inevitable infirmities of advanced years. The plaintive cry of David has been the experience of many since his day: "The days of my years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow."

But we are constrained to believe the picture is not all so dark. Christian old age has its unspeakable comforts. Some of these are found in the reviews of life. Years ago Christ was "the fairest among ten thousand," chosen above sinful pleasure or wealth. Others were charmed by ambition, their ears were shut against the cry of injured innocence, they smiled at legalized iniquity, they courted the suffrages of party without principle, and were elevated to the temporary seats of fame; but the choice of Christ was made contrary to all these, and from the highest dictates of duty. In choosing Christ, this aged pilgrim in those early years come into possession of wisdom, a sense of pardon, and a renewed nature; he received power from above to do all things pleasing to God, both as to inward habits and outward acts.

How delightful to recount such experiences, and review life thus dignified by the glory of a rich, personal knowledge of religion. A survey of the present is also the joy of Christian old age. The gospel is more widely known and felt, the drinciples of civil and religious freedom are more fully vindicated in the earth against the pretensions of despotic empire; the marked advances of a better civilization give comfort, and are the promise of a more complete deliverance of the race from degrading vice, under the guidance of Christ.

Rich joy is derived from the anticipations of an eternal future. The eye is dim, but the vision of the soul penetrates beyond star and sun, and opens upon the ineffable glories of heaven. Who can reproduce upon speaking canvas those pictures of future bliss that so often fill the good man's soul with holy transport? Many an honored saint has been lifted to the highest heavens, a spiritual altitude from which unutterable views break forth. We have known such; their step was halting, their hand tremulous, their nerves were shattered, but the silent awe, the sweet peace, the adoring love, were the signs of rich heavenly foretastes.

Sanctified old age has its many lessons. We are taught in it the divine reality of religion. Enter within that lowly cottage; see suspended from its walls such mottoes as "God bless our home," "Thy statutes have been our songs in the house of our pilgrimage." Mark how that piety fills the whole dwelling with richest fragrance, a piety matured under the varied processes of life-long discipline. Here we shall be impressed when human logic has failed to convince us.

Let us not say that sanctified age has fulfilled its mission, and that it were better to depart. Wait! The traveler who has journeyed along the precipice, down whose giddy height thousands have fallen, may be able to give many valuable suggestions to inexperienced tourists. Have we one at home whose heart is young, but whose eye is dim and form tottering, who follows us with his blessing wherever we roam, over land or sea; who has wisdom in counsel and joy in our success? Bless God for the gift. Cherish it; venerate such a character. Joyfully bear whatever burden such infirmities may bring. Soon these lips will be sealed forever. Soon you may find yourself in a like condition of decrepitude and dependence. God will take notice of your faithful attention to hoary age. "Honor thy father and mother, which is the first commandment with promise."

A Mother's Prayers.

A Christian mother placed a New Testament into the hands of her boy who was just about to commence a seafaring life. The lad was thoughtless. careless, and although so young, was quite unmanageable, the resul of mixing with evil companions. But his mother's prayers followed him; and although many years passed away without seeing or hearing anything of her boy, the loving mother never forgot him at the throne of grace. She inquired of all she met who were likely to know the whereabouts of her boy, but in vain.

But one day a half naked sailor knocked at her door to ask for relief. The sight of a sailor always interested her, and she heard his tale. He had seen great perils, and had been wrecked several times, but was never so destitute as at one time, when himself and a "fine young gentleman" were the only individuals saved of a whole ship's crew. "We were cast upon a desert island, where, after seven days and nights, I closed his eyes." And while the tears stole down his face, he told of the happiness experienced by his mate, which he said he got by reading a little book his mother gave him when a boy, and which was the only thing he saved. "He gave it to me," he continued, "just as he was dying," and said: "There, Jack, take it and may God bless you."

"Is all this true!" asked the trembling and astonished mother.

"Yes, madam, every word of it." And then, dragging from his ragged jacket a little book, much battered and time-worn, and held it up, exclaiming, "And here's the very book."

She seized the Testament, descried her own handwriting, and beheld the name of her son coupled with her own on the cover. She gazed, she read, she wept, she rejoiced. She seemed to hear a voice which said: "Behold, thy son liveth!"—The Golden Censer.

Christ and the Pharisees.

The scribes and Pharisees crowded about Jesus to entangle him, if possible, in his talk or detect in his works some violation of their traditions. And they did not have to wait long. When sinful man makes laws for the government of the Man Divine, both the humanity and the divinity of our Lord cry out against them. For the sake of man, upon whom Phariseeism would bind heavy burdens, and for vindication of his own authority, he will burst their narrow restraints. And when he does—"He hath a devil." What does it matter to the Pharisees that a man has been healed by the word of Jesus? What do they care for the faulty logic, which divides a kingdom against itself? Was madness ever sympathizing or reasonable? The Pharisees are MAD, infuriated by the presence of him whose pure life was a benediction to earth's needy ones but a constant rebuke to their hypocrisy.

——o——

You are placed where you are, in a particular business, in a particular street, to help on there the kingdom of God. You cannot do that when you are old and ready to die. By that time your companions will have fought their fight, and lost or won. If they lose, will you not be sorry that you did not help them? Wil you not regret that only at the last you helped the kingdom of God? Perhaps you will not be able to do it then. And then your life has been lost indeed. Very few people have the opportunity to seek the kingdom of God at the end. Christ knowing all that, knowing that religion was a thing for our life, not merely for our deathbed, has laid this command upon us now: "Seek first the kingdom of God."—Prof. Drummond.

MUNICIPAL REFORM.

Doctor Parkhurst's Latest Explanation of His Plans.

Our contention is that the laws are not enforced, that the authorities are in criminal collusion with criminals, that vice and crime are protected for the money there is in it, that our public servants are paid by us to execute the laws, and that they are bought by criminals to beat the laws. We are of the people, a part of the public of this great city. Not even our worst enemy, our bitterest opponent, questions our motives or the sincerity of our purposes.

WHOSE CITY IS THIS.

Our one supreme object is to raise the tone of our citizenship. Whose city is this? Does it belong to the criminals and the police, or to us, to the people? Sovereignty is vested in the people—in the citizen. Those we elect to do our will,for which we pay them, are our servants—not our masters. Having elected or chosen on election day our officials for the year, responsibility and sovereignty do not pass out of our hands for the remaining 364 days of the year. We have the right to watch, judge, criticise and remove our servants from our employment if they do not perform the work for which we pay them.

It is a notorious fact that our servants, who are paid by us to execute the laws, are the paid protectors of lawbreakers, and we say we have the right as citizens and as taxpayers to protect our interests in good government and to compel, by all lawful means, the obedience of our servants to the laws.

We claim no right not possessed by any other citizen or body of citizens. The trouble in a great city like New York is that the corrective force of public opinion is not operative as in smaller communities. The masses of the people are unfamiliar with their public duties, with the forms of their government,with their civic rights and municipal responsibilities. In order for men to be good citizens they must know their city; its laws, its functions, and the duties of the authorities; and this is one of the educational aims of the league.

We base our right to organize this league for good government not alone on the inherent right of citizenship, but upon precedents and examples of the exercise of this right. For example, take the business men of the United States. There are over a million of them, yet every firm is "rated" by Bradstreet's or Dun's. Not only their wealth, their commercial responsibility and experience, but their habits of life and past records for honesty and upright dealings are recorded. The whole foundation of commercial credit is built upon this system. Yet what the million of American business men consider a valuable and indispensable element in the conduct of private business, is felt to be an intolerable espionage on the part of our salaried public servants. For my part, I think what an American business man feels the need of, a New York policeman can ultimately manage to endure without giving up his position on the force.

VICE AND CRIME A COMMODITY.

But, while justifying the claim of the citizen—any citizen—of the right to watch the performance of duty by his public servant we disclaim being a detective force, amateur or otherwise. Any citizen can to-day go to any one of the hundred detective agencies in this city and secure all the detective service he wants. The interested people who make a pretense of offense at our organization for this reason are usually the ones whose public service would probably end the moment they were subjected to it. Besides, the police want a monopoly of it. Vice and crime in this city have become a commodity. A traffic has sprung up between the criminals and the authorities and any assault upon this trading is looked upon as an interference with vested rights.

We propose to quicken the public conscience, to educate the intelligence, to arouse the municipal patriotism of our citizens. The tendency of things is always bad,unless checked and controlled by the element in every community that is for things of good report. Our organization is to mobilize this power for the public weal. The personal affairs of a private citizen give us no concern. They do not interest us. But a corrupt traffic between our public employes—our city officials—and the city's criminals is the subject to which we will give much of our attention.

In the matter of excise, for instance, a man takes out a license for a saloon. He gets that license from us—from the people. We intend to know whether he violates any of the terms of the contract he makes with us. We intend to "keep tab" on him; to know when his contract expires, and to be informed as to the wisdom of renewing it or not. We love this city not for the loaves and fishes. Politics, neither for the revenue nor the offices, concerns us not. This great city is in some respects like an immense joint stock company, in which we are all shareholders, and in the prosperity of which we all have a voice and a direct personal interest. We believe the laws and ordinances which form the constitution and bylaws of our municipal company are right in saying gambling houses and disorderly resorts are an evil and a hindrance to our company's welfare. We say the officers of our company must look after our interests and enforce our municipal rules.

ON THE WATCH FOR BLACK SHEEP.

Now as to our membership. There is no flock without black sheep. Even so immaculate a body of men as the New York police force has been known to be afflicted in this respect. The Society for the Prevention of Crime will exercise every precaution possible to any other of the numerous similar public and private organizations in the choice of its servants and membership. We will have black sheep, and we will have to accept the consequences of their conduct in the same way and to the same extent as others do. We do no depend upon the sudden enthusiasm and sporadic efforts to better things, and, therefore, we will not take every one that comes along. We are not hurrying. We are going on with our work carefully and methodically, and we are doing it upon the safe and prudent lines that apply to any other important private or public undertaking.

Our maps will pictorially point out the saloons, the churches,the schools, the gambling houses and the disorderly houses. They will be a powerful appeal in themselves to public opinion. Already large owners of realty are making inquiry of their agents as to how their property is being occupied. In one case to my knowledge, a church was the landlord of a disorderly house. These things we will correct. Already there is a quickening of public conscience, and only this week an editorial in one of our morning papers stated New York was an exceedingly dangerous place for any man to try to lead a double or vicious life! At no time within ten years has there been such an awakening of civic pride and municipal patriotism. Soon the power of an aroused public opinion will be come irresistible.

COVERING EVERY NOOK AND CRANNY.

There are thirty Assembly districts. In each of these we appoint an Assembly Supervisor. Each Assembly district has an average of forty election districts. The Assembly Supervisor has charge of the organization of his election districts. In each election district there will be one to three election district supervisors. They will agree among themselves who shall be the Chairman. The General Committee will be composed of the 1,137 chairman of the Election districts. They will report to the Assembly supervisors, who will compose the Executive Committee.

Membership will be divided into active and associate. The active members will pay their dues in work. The associate will pay dues of not less than $3 per year in cash. Active members must be not under twenty nor over sixty years of age. All of the members are kept in constant touch with the officers and Executive Committee by means of regular and special bulletins,of which the two have been issued, and a copy of Bulletin No. 3 is now nearly ready for distribution.—Commercial Advertiser, New York.

Philip Doddridge.

A humility that seems to measure itself is the most perilous form of hidden selfishness. The meanest exhibition of poor human nature is a studied affectation in respect to this Christian grace. An assumed superiority over others at this point is the surest evidence of pride. Such pride "goeth before destruction." Watchfulness just here is necessary, for Satan is a subtile, implacable enemy whatever may be our real or supposed religious attainments.

The following incident in the intercourse of Philip Doddridge with John Wesley is pertinent. In their friendly correspondence the phrase, "Faithful, humble servant," had been employed by Doddridge, and had occasioned a slight comment by Wesley.

Doddridge replied with characteristic meekness, "Your caution has suggested a thought to me, whether it be modest to call ourselves humble? If the expression means a real readiness to serve in love in any thing low, as in washing the feet of another, I hope I can say, 'I am your humble servant;' but if it mean one who is in all respects as humble as he could wish, God forbid that I should arrogate so proud a title. In what can I say I have already attained? Only in that I love my divine Master. I would not have a thought in my heart that he should disapprove. feel sweetness in being assuredly in his gracious hand, which all the world cannot possibly afford, and which I really think would make me happier in a dark dungeon than ten thousand worlds could render me without it; and therefore I love every creature in the earth that bears his image; and I do not except those who, through ignorance, rashness, or prejudice, have greatly injured me."

The experience of this saint of God, thus expressed, is most suggestive. Love—pure, divine love—filling the soul with celestial sweetness is the sure safeguard against a false humility. How is this love perfected within us? First, the Holy Spirit reveals the ineffable holiness of God; the purity and reasonableness of his law. Second, in the same moment, our utter unworthiness and condemnation in the sight of God are disclosed. Third, the power of Jesus' merit is made known by the revealing Holy Spirit. Fourth, through the aid of the same blessed Comforter we claim a personal interest in that merit, whereupon the "love of God is shed abroad in our hearts."

When this love holds complete way the heart is ready for services, however ignoble that work may seem to the unregenerate world; and that love brought into the soul through a deep sense of divine holiness, and of its own native defilement, will be a constant protection against a counterfeit humility, that is sometimes bashful in order that it may be praised—"runs away in order that it may be pursued."

On the other hand, should any one be in danger of self-depreciation, should Satan interpose a false accusation—namely, that his humility of spirit was only an outgrowth of self-love—let him turn away from all such unprofitable introspection. Perfect love that "casteth out fear," and that holds the soul in constant allegiance to God, is injured by such morbid mental exercises. Look away from self. Look immediately, steadily, to Him in whom alone spiritual completeness is possible.

EDITORIAL.

Dr. Harrison, our book editor, has issued a book entitled "Gospel among the Slaves." He gives credit to Miss Annie Maria Banes for "collecting the materials of the volume from contemporary sources." From it we learn of the work done by the people of the South for the religious instruction of the negroes before they were emancipated. The Southern Methodist Church in one year (1859,) with a colored membership of 163,296, raised for missions to the colored people $130,076.88. During the last year of the war, when half her territory had been devastated, this church raised $80,000 for negro evangelization. Fully $2,000,000 in addition to this was paid by slave owners for this, purpose, and the best preachers and best people, both men and women, of that country carried on the work.

There appears to be an alarming increase of drunkenness among the women of our land. It is not simply among the coarser element, but among those who would figure in society and be leaders of fashion. The accounts of drinking and drunkenness among women at the last "inaugural ball" are revolting. From childhood we feared and abhorred a drunken man, but the sight of a drunken woman is most painful and disgusting. True, women have as much legal right to collect together and carouse as the liege lords of creation, but what shall we think of the moral sense of those who do so and of the state of society when such things become common? Truly, the dikes are giving way where this is the case, and we have need to be alarmed. The "Wesleyan" thinks "there are two innovations in the broad circle of female society which are calculated to weaken the circle and to open the way for many vices. They are expressed in one sentence: A live growing opposition to maternity, and a live, growing disposition to masculinity." There is food for thought in the suggestion. When human nature in any department is thrown out of harmony with its true environment, there comes friction, unrest, and the way is open for the inrush of many vices that debase and destroy. "If the foundations be destroyed what can the righteous do?"

Before us is a copy of the Howard-Payne Exponent, published by the young ladies of the Howard-Payne Female College., Fayette, Mo. Miss Mattie Payne is editor-in-chief. It is a double column, twenty-four page sheet, printed on good paper, with cover, and is full of spicy reading. Price fifty cents. We wish it great success.

Before this paper is in the hands of most of its readers the Board of Missions will be in session at Kansas City. This will be the first time the Board ever deliberated so near the setting sun. We trust that this change in the place of meeting will bring good fruit in two ways: first, by impressing the Board more strongly, than ever before, with the urgent needs of the Western work, and secondly, by bringing our people into closer sympathy with the work of the Board, which is only the agent of the church, and arouse them to greater enthusiasm and liberality in missionary work. Hardly a generation has passed since the country all about Kansas City was included in the foreign (Indian) mission field. See whereunto the work has grown. Why may not the same history be repeated in fields farther West? Who can foretell the result of faithful sowing in this fertile field? May God give us faith and courage to go forward. There remaineth much land to possess, and the cry comes up from many places "Come over and help us."

——

Dr. John, we are pleased to learn, is improving, but will hardly be able to attend the meeting of the Board. His genial face, fervent spirit and wise counsels will be greatly missed. But we are thankful that his life is spared to the church, and thus can bear cheerfully the loss for one session.

——

The editor will (D. V.) attend the meeting of the Board of Missons, and our readers may expect to hear of some things that come under his observation while absent from home.

——

During the past week or two, there have been cyclones throughout the great Mississippi valley extending from San Antonio almost to St. Paul, in which more than thirty persons were killed, 300 or more badly injured and a million and a half dollars worth of property destroyed. More recently, there has been a great snowstorm, with from six inches to a foot and a half of snow on a level in Minnesota and other portions of the Northwest, and frost that has greatly injured the fruit and early crops; while to the west of us, in Washington, the floods of deep waters have greatly impeded railroad traffic and travel. During all this confusion in the elements and in the world about us, the people of Bitter Root Valley have pursued undisturbed the even tenor of their way, sowing their grain, making gardens and driving their capering cattle, horses and sheep to graze on the growing verdure of a thousand hills and of many lovely valleys that lie between. Surely the contrast is most striking.

——

The Tennessee Methodist, in commenting upon the suggestion that the Christian ministry exerts less intellectual influence upon society than it did formerly, very clearly shows that even if the admission is made it means nothing. It does not argue any decline in the average intelligence of the ministry, but a marked grading up among the masses of the people. There was not the opportunity for proportionate intellectual growth. In conclusion the editor adds these forcible words:

While the clergy should in no sense or degree neglect or discount intellectual culture, it must be remembered that it is not by "intellectual influence" that the preacher is to convert souls. -Lectures on Emerson, sermons on Thackery, and homilies on Geologic themes, may attract the notice and the attendance of a few of the literary, but will not convict them of sin or advance them in the life of faith after they come. Sin and salvation, the Holy Ghost and Christ, are themes essential and profoundly interesting to the unlettered and the lierati, and it is all the better for both classes if these truths be discussed in the simplest, but most cultured terms which sanctified learning and scholarship can command. It is Christ, however, and not culture that will save; but He can use and He delights to use the most refined, as well as the rudest means.

——

Rev. D. M. Proctor, of Harden, Mo., writes us a note that, while it astonishes, greatly refreshes us. When he was changed from Platte City, the paper failed to change, though he says he so ordered. The postmaster tried to stop it but failed, though the preacher supposed it had stopped, as it was not sent to his new address, until he returned on a visit to his old charge, when he found the Montana Methodist, which the postmaster had thoughtfully distributed, doing missionary work among the old parishioners. Instead of ordering it stopped at once, as many would do, our good brother actually writes again requesting that the paper be changed, and offering to pay up arrearages (though there happens to be none) and continued. Surely he is one of a hundred. We have remembered him from the first time we ever saw his face—at the conference at Weston, Mo., in 1868. He is a live, genial, jolly spirit, successful in winning souls to Christ, and we appreciate and heartily reciprocate the earnest words with which he closes his cordial note, "God bless the Montana work abundantly."

——

Rev. D. B. Price, of Conway, Ark., says the St. Louis Advocate, has been employed by the presiding elder to take charge of the church at Oklahoma City. We are glad to know that little Olin who has been under treatment for chronic inflammation of the knee joint, is improving.

——

We greatly regret to learn that there has been another bank failure at Wallace, Idaho. The Coeur d' Alene Bank has failed, with liabilities amounting to $95,000, and the Miner's Exchange, which was owned by the same company, failed at Wardner at the same time with liabilities amounting to $25,000. The "Miner," published at Wallace, has some very plain and forcible words upon the laxity of the laws regulating our banking system and the ease and frequency with which the laboring men are swindled out of their hard-earned wages. Can there be no system adopted that will give security to depositors?

With the great fire that swept Wallace several years ago, then the failure of the Hussy Bank, then the great strike, and now another bank failure, the Coeur d' Alene people are having a hard time of it. But they are a plucky folk and will come out all right in the end. We trust so, at least.

——

Brother Nathan Evans, of Waitsburg, Wash., renews his subscription and in accordance with Brother Bell's plan, sends a new subscriber, and adds: "Please continue my paper. I like the little "Montana Methodist" better than any paper that I get."

Many thanks for the kind words. We shall endeavor to keep the standard up, and earnestly request our friends to co-operate with us.

——

Rev. T. W. Alton, of Butte, is endeavoring to mature a plan by which the Methodist can be placed on a solid financial basis and printed in one of the principal cities in our own Conference. We wish him abundant success. Our Brother claims to be a practical printer and ought to have sense about such things.

The Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church, South., for April, contains the usual number of thought-inspiring articles. The "Editor's Table" treating on "Freedom of Religious Thought," "The Imprecatory Psalms," "The True Theory of Inspiration," "Mr. Wesley and Sophia Causton," "Bonding and Losing," "Two New Books," alone is worth the subscription for one year. There is also a rich and racy article on Rev. R. Abbey, by Bishop Galloway, one on "Our Theology and our Science," by J. Wofford Tucker. Dr. Harrison is one of the learned men of the day, and is putting some of the best thought and work of his life for the cause of truth and righteousness into this Review. It should be in every Methodist, particularly in every Methodist preacher's home. Price only two dollars per annum. Address Barber and Smith, Nashville, Tenn.

The Preachers' Magazine, for preachers, teachers and Bible students, edited by Mark Guy Pearse and Arthur E. Gregory, is a reprint from the English edition. It is full of excellent sermons and suggestions for thinking people. Price $1.50 a year.

We have received, with the compliments of Chas. S. Fee, St. Paul, Minn, a copy of a paper bound book entitled "Six Thousand Miles Through Wonderland," being a "description of the marvelous region traversed by the Northern Pacific Railroad, by Olive D. Wheeler, with illustrations from photos by Haynes." The mechanical execution is tasteful and attractive; the illustrations are among the finest that we have ever seen. The book includes a plain, brief sketch of the principal objects of interest from Duluth to the Pacific ocean, including the Yellowstone National Park, with its many enchantments, Coeur d' Alene Lake, Custer's battle and battle ground, etc. There is also a complete colored map of the Yellowstone Park, with information just such as the tourist to and through the Northwest desires to possess. If you think of coming this way, send to Chas. S. Fee, St. Paul, Minn., and get a copy. We suppose they are for free distribution.

Mrs. Sarah R. Dougherty recently died at Jersey City. Her father was ordained a minister by Bishop Coke and her mother was baptized by John Wesley.

The Review of Reviews for April is a most interesting number. It contains a sketch of President Cleveland's cabinet, with portraits of himself and his advisors, a sketch of the World's Parliament of Religions, with portraits of some of the representative men who will figure therein, including Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald, of the M. E. church, South, an article on "How should Women dress at the World's Fair," with illustrations, and numerous other contributions on the leading issues of the day. This is appropriately styled the "Busy Man's Magazine," as it contains the gist of the world's thought and life condensed into a small space. Price $2.50 a year. It and the Montana Methodist for $3.00.

——

The town of Wardner, Idaho, about 12 miles from Wallace in the Coeur d' Alene country, was almost totally destroyed by fire on Thursday, April 20. The loss is estimated at $125,000 and insurance very light. The houses were crowded together along the steep mountain-sides of a deep canyon, and the water supply failed, and hence the flames had full sway, much the same as at Wallace when that town was burned several years ago. The people of Wallace and adjacent towns rallied nobly to the relief of the homeless people. They know how to sympathize with them.

——

We welcome the return of the Northwestern Christian Advocate, which by some hook or crook, for quite a time disappeared from our list of exchanges. While we do not agree with Dr. Arthur Edwards in all that he writes, yet we regard him as one of the wide awake men of the day and his paper in the forefront of the Methodist Advocate family.

——

A case of Asiatic cholera run the Canadian gauntlet and made its appearance with a company of 225 immigrants at Winnepeg in Canada. The people came from the cholera-infected districts in Europe and were heading for North Dakota. They were of all nationalities and all had certificates of good health. This will surely put the authorities on their guard in that quarter. It is said that the quarantine is complete at present, and there is no fear that it will spread into Dakota from that quarter.

——

A Dakota woman has spent ten years in collecting materials and making a cloak of prairie chicken feathers, only a few choice feathers being furnished by each bird. The feathers are held in place by separate stitches, and arranged so as to give the best effect to the tints. It has a beaver colar, is valued at $1,000, and will be on exhibition at the Woman's Building during the World's Fair.

It is now pretty evident that the hoisting of the American flag over the public buildings in Hawaii, was premature, and they have been taken down. The adminstration will proceed with caution in the case, and we trust that the best thing possible will be done, both for our own country and for the Sandwich Islands. It is said that Mr. Cleveland has a theory of his own which he will carry out in the case.

——

A fire occurred in the silver Bow mine in Butte City on Friday the 21st, ult. by which nine miners who were "stopping" on levels distant from the shaft and could not be worried in time to make their escape, were suffocated by the heat and gas. It is another lesson showing the danger attending those who are carrying on this great industry of our country. The account of the sad event, as given in the daily papers is appalling. Heroic deeds were performed in efforts to rescue the men alive. We sympathize most deeply with the bereaved families. What name of persons ought we to be every day and hour, seeing that life in this world is suspended on such a brittle thread.

——

There was recently a big strike among the employees on the World's Fair Buildings at Chicago, but as the strikers feared the adverse verdict of a waiting and impatient world, and the commissooners were only too anxious to have the work completed, a settlement was soon effected, with no special advantage to the strikers.

——

The old Fort Owen flouring mill, near Stevensville, was recently burned, which was supposed to be the work of an incendiary. It was the first flouring mill built in Montana, the flour manufactured being carried on pack-animals across the mountains by an old Indian trail to the mining camps east of the range.

The county of Ravalle comes into existence with a debt of $54,-108 and an assessment roll of about $1,500,000. We trust that the former shall decrease while the latter shall increase as the years roll on.

While at Deer Lodge recently we had the pleasure of meeting with Dr. G. F. Foster, of Memphis, Mo. He is both a physician and an occulist, and has attained no little distinction as a specialist in treating the diseases of the eye in the country where he is known. He was for years associated with Dr. Williams, of St. Louis, Mo., and studied under the venerable Dr. E. Williams of Cincinnati, Ohio. He was sent for by telegraph to come all the way to Montana to treat a case—that of Sister Ben Lear, of Deer Lodge, who is threatened with blindness. The doctor will spend some months in Montana, and will visit our principal cities. His address, however, is Memphis, Mo.

A Great Work.

It is a great work to lead souls to Christ; but it is no greater than to care for them after they have been accepted of him.

How hard we labor, how almost incessantly we pray for the conversion of sinners! Yet how indifferent we often are toward young Christians struggling with temptations! How austere in our judgment of him who, in an unwanton hour, has yielded to sin and fallen! Christ reaches down his gentle hand and bids the Davids and Peters rise, and gladly accepts and blesses them more abundantly than before, if they call on him in a contrite spirit. Let us, too, sympathize with, pray for, and kindly advise these babes in Christ in their first efforts to walk the straight and narrow way, and we shall be doing a great work.

FRUITS OF WISDOM.

LESSON TEXT.—Prov. 12:1-15.

Teaching Hints.

BY A. F. SCHAUFFLER, D. D.

This is a very hard lesson, and so the teacher must take especial pains with it. Begin by trying to make the scholar understand that in all things in this world action has results, and that you cannot do anything that has not some consequences flowing from it. From childhood to old age each word, each thought, each deed, has its results. Sometimes we can see these results, and sometimes we cannot. But they exist all the same. Sometimes we can see the results at once, and at other times we must wait for years before they become apparent. But, come soon or come late, they always come. For example, a boy may play truant for a time, and not suffer. For the time being he thinks that all is going well, and indeed he seems to be having a better time than the boy who goes regularly to school. But the day is sure to come when he will begin to reap the fruits of his folly. Another young man may be living a dissolute life, and yet enjoy a large measure of health. But in future years the result of his dissipation will begin to manifest itself, and he will find himself becoming prematurely old. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." This saying has always been true, and always will be. Let the teacher illustrate this in whatever way he thinks best. Having thus gotten the root idea of the lesson before the class,you will be ready to go on and see how it is presented in the text.

Let some scholar read the first verse. Here we see some of the characteristics of the wise man and of the fool. The child who heeds what is said, even if it comes in the way of rebuke, is wise; for in that way only will he learn to avoid evil. We can all learn in two ways. One is that of bitter experience, and the other is by the experience of others. In many matters we should be glad to learn by the experience of others; as, for example, we do not all want to burn ourselves at the fire,in order to learn how it hurts. We are content to be told of the effects of a burn by those who have suffered from it. We had all much rather be warned the experience of others of the danger of cholera,than push ahead heedlessly and learn it for ourselves. As I write this lesson the physicians of the land are trying hard to learn from others what are the best means of avoiding this terrible disease. And in this they are wise,and all commend them. But,alas! in matters that pertain to the soul men are not as wise as they are in things pertaining to the body. They do not love the warnings of their elders, and had rather learn for themselves. Here we see,then, the characteristics of a wise child. He heeds the warning of those over him, and turns aside from the path of danger, while the foolish boy or girl pushes ahead and gets caught in the snare.

Now let some scholar read verses 2 and 3. Here we see the divine side of wise action. Wise action secures the favor of God, while the deeds of the wicked God will condemn. And not only so, but a wise man shall be established, while the way of the wicked shall not prosper. But some scholar may ask, "Are there not wicked men who do prosper, after all?" Yes, for a while; but even in this world, if we watch carefully, we shall be surprised to see how, in the long run, the ways of the wicked are turned upside down. Sooner or later they seem to "come to grief." And even if they do not do this in this world, we must never forget that there is another world that comes after this. God does not settle all his accounts with men in this world. "It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." In that day it will be seen by all that the wicked shall not prosper; for then the way of the righteous shall be finally established, but the wicked shall be like chaff which the wind driveth away. There all that looks crooked in this world will be made straight by our heavenly Father. Injustice will be rectified, and iniquity will be punished. The judgment day will reveal the consequences of sin and the reward of all right doing.

Now read verse 10. Truly the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is an old one. Mr. Bergh was not the founder of it; for the wise man wanted every one to be a member of such an association many centuries ago. Many children seem to take delight in afflicting suffering on animals. Teach them that this is a shame. All animals ought to be gently treated, and it is a sign of savagery if we inflict on them needless suffering. We have made great progress in the right direction in the right direction in this matter. When I remember how the car-horses used to be maltreated in New York years ago, and how seldom you see any such maltreatment in these days, I am filled with joy. Let the scholars be taught that they should treat all dogs, horses, cats, birds, and all living things gently, and that, if it be needful to take their lives, it should be done in the way that inflicts the least suffering.

Now go on to verse 11. This practically means that not only farmers, but all workers,shall prosper, who are diligent, and that success lies along the line of industry. Our present age needs to learn this; for there are far too many in our schools who want to take some short cut to success. They have not "stick-to-ativeness." They change from place to place, trying always to get an easier berth. They look more to luck for success than to application, and as a result they fail most pitifully. Any one in a large city may see hundreds of examples of this. In fact,many leave the country simply because they do not like hard work, and they hope in the city to find easy work and high wages. For the way in which they are mistaken in this,witness the army of the unemployed in our large centers. The city is full of such wrecks, drifting to and fro in search of work that they never find.

Now read the last verse. Ten chances to one it accurately describes some boy or girl in your class. "The way of the foolish is right in his own eyes." This is one of the traits of "Young America." It knows better than its elders, and the result may be seen in the large number of "failures." Let the wise scholar be warned in time, and take the advice of those who know more than he does; for if he will not do this, he will have to reap the bitter consequences.—S. S. Times.

Great Peace.

Nothing offends. There may be great confusion in the church; warfare, and strife, and contention among brethren; discord among the saints; but "Thou wilt keep in perfect peace," and "great peace." Christians will be in much confusion owing to bigotry, superstition, and the theology of the church; creed-bondage would seemingly rend the church asunder; but "great peace have they that love Thy law," and and sweet tenderness toward each other, with no superciliousness, no crimination, no disputation, no fighting for dogmas or creeds of man's making; but great peace. "MY PEACE I give unto you." And as little children we sit down together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and He brings us to His banqueting house and His banner over us is love.

—o—

Judge Not.

The Holy Spirit leads us always to obey the Word of God; and does not desire us to sit upon the judgment seat, and minister discipline to others. He desires us to speak the truth in love; not in a censorious manner; not to lord it over others; not in a "holier than thou" spirit; not in a Pharisaical way; but in meekness, gentleness, love, to stand for the truth as is in Jesus, and to bear the infirmities of the weak and "so fulfil the law of Christ." Never dispute, nothing gained in that way. Assert, and leave it. Never fault-finders, murmurers, or complainers; but always rejoicers, and thanksgivers. Who made thee a judge in Israel?

—o—

The more God empties your hands of other works, the more you may know he has special work to give them.—Garrett.

—o—

Riches in their acquisition bring pain and suffering, in their loss manifold trouble and sorrow, in their possession a wild intoxication. How can we say that they confer happiness?

The Bible Everywhere.

One of the peculiarities of the Bible, familiar, perhaps, to you all, is that it is portable. We have it in one written volume. The whole revealed will of God—the history of his dealings with humanity—the origin and moral history of men—the words and redemptive work of Christ—and the outcome of the future of our race—have all been written in God's book, and in so small a compass that it can be carried in a pocket or placed with inconvenience under one's arm, and printed for a few cents. The seaman cannot take his church or his preacher to sea with him, but this book will be his companion wherever he may go over the waters of the earth. The emigrant leaving home, and kindred, and sanctuary, amid the babble of strange tongues in foreign lands, may still have God to speak to him in his native tongue. It is locked up with the prisoner in his cell; it goes to the office with the professional man; it is the college companion of the son and brother of a Christian home; it is the comfort and solace of the "shut in." The deaf and dumb can hear its voice, and the eyes of the blind are not shut to the light of its pages. Our common schools have placed in the hands of the people the golded key of knowledge, whereby this treasure-house can be unlocked and its riches appropriated. The language is simple and easy understood, for it has largely influenced the development of our English tongue. Much of its instruction is given in figurative language that will need no human interpretation so long as men dwell amid the scenes of nature. As long as the sun rises in the morning, driving the darkness before its flashing sword, and making visible that which night robed in blackness, men will have some idea of what Christ meant when he said, "I am the light of the world." So long as men enter the shelter and safety of home through a door shutting them in, and shutting danger out, they will understand what the Master means when he says, "I am the door." So long as fatherhood exists in humanity, and we remember our father's love manifested to us in a thousand ways, or we are fathers ourselves to children who have come into our hearts never more to go out, we will gather some notion of the content of the words, "Our Father, which art in heaven." I thank God for this volume which goes everywhere in the world where men can go, and which has for its interpreters the sun, moon, stars, the trees, the vines, the common occupations and relationships of life, and the deepest, truest movings of the human heart.

—REV. MATTHEWS S. HUGHES.

—o—

Where should our children be, if not in the church? We should fervently thank God whenever one of the "little ones" who has just taken a few steps from the fold hears and heeds the Sheperd's first call, and comes back to shelter.

METHODIST RELICS AT THE FAIR.

The Historical society of the Methodist Episcopal church will make an interesting exhibit of Methodist relics at the World's Fair. Among the articles are Bishop Asbury's old tea-canister, which he always carried with him on his travels, and his old-time spectacles and saddle-bags; Bishop McKendrie's clothes-brush, which looks as if it had seen good service; a collection of canes that belonged to the fathers of American Methodism, the most curious of which is a white-oak stick from a tree in Carroll county, Md., under which Strawbridge and Evans held their first meeting. There are also locks of hair from the heads of Bishop Asbury, his mother, Bishop McKendrie, Bishop Emery, and Father Smith. The exhibit will include a dozen or more original portraits of famous Methodist leaders.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

A writer in one of the daily papers says concerning the bustle and preparation going on to get the World's Fair ready to open by the first of May: Clear the track! "Look out for the locomotive" is not one of the signs in Jackson Park, but steam trains are snorting through the grounds, delivering freight at the great show buildings and startling the early visitors by their peremptory passage.

How fantastic the engine and train looked this afternoon as the engine, tender first, came puffing over the bridge of the south canal, its black smoke wreathing about one of the historic columns, blurring the stupid looking plaster bear on the parapet and scudding across the grand basin toward the agricultural building and statue of the republic!

How picturesque this "last lap" of the fair is!

How the clang of the engine bell and clatter of the hammer, and the hum of sawmill, and tramp of thousands of feet and a score of other particular sounds jumbled together effect the mind with a sense of rush that somehow epitomizes in its own way the haste to "get there" that characterizes our national life!

The sawmill between the transportation building and the incomplete choral hall hums and sputters all day long, and cars block the passage to nearby gates and threaten to topple you with their loads of long flapping boards.

Regiments, armies of workmen are scattered through the grounds. A regiment does not go far in an area so vast as this white city by the sea. When the roof of the manufacturers building leaks they put a thousand men up there to tinker the difficulty, and to the eye of the observer from the ground a little distance off these men look like so many flies swarming on a sugar barrel. A few thousand men are scarcely within the gate when you miss and lose them. It is impossible to say where they have gone.

The truth is that they have gone everywhere. They are in the rafters and under the floors. They are painting sky tints in pagodas and chalking spaces in machinery hall. They are tugging at derricks shoveling in trenches, clinging to the tops of electric light poles, laying sod, making repairs where wood and plaster have stopped looking like marble, roofing sideshows, picking into ground that holds its frost to the last minute, putting together badly dislocated Venuses, filling water tanks, standing up signs that ask you to keep off imaginary grass, unhousing statuary, patching weather-beaten groups, steadying the parapet goats and bears, paddling lumber, rafts on the canal, carrying shoulder loads of lumber, conferring with walking delegates, discussing plans with directors, eating lunch in odd corners and answering the questions of bewildered visitors.

In fact, the fair is already a great sight; the greatest sight this country has ever seen.

"SOUTHWEST MISSOURI NOTES."

Mr. Editor:—As Montana is so largely supplied with men from Missouri, notes from the Southwest may not be altogether uninteresting to the numerous readers of your excellent paper. As a chat about the weather is always in order, permit me to say, we have had more continuous cold weather the past winter, than we have had in any winter since this scribe has been in the West. We have had colder weather many times before, but not so much of it. The Missouri River was blocked 56 days continuously. It is feared the wheat has sustained great damage by the dry cold winter. However, Missouri always has enough and to spare. Many of the farmers in Vernon county have sowed their oats, and the bursting buds of the lilac tell us that spring is surely at hand.

The past winter has been a season of great revival interest all over the state, and many precious souls have been brought to the Lord. Among the many places visited with gracious revivals, none are more prominent than our educational centers. Fayette has been wondrously blessed, and many of her sons and daughters have professed faith in Christ.

"Central College For Young Ladies," located at Lexington, shared largely in the revival conducted there by Rev. W. J. Carpenter. Nearly all the students in this popular institution gave their hearts to the Saviour. "Cotty College," a school for young ladies exclusively, and one of the very best places for our daughters, was wonderfully benefited by the gracious revival that visited Nevada. This school has been placed under the fostering care of the Southwest Montana Conference, and deservedly enjoys the confidence of all who are acquainted with it. All the boarders in this institution professed faith in Christ, and attached themselves to the church, save two. "Scarritt Collegiate Institute," located in Neosho, and one of the very best educational institutions in the state, has been doing splendid work, and the gracious revival which spread over that place, had a fine effect upon the young people in that institution. "Morrisville College," from the halls of which the Southwest Missouri Conference has been so largely reinforced, has not been passed by.

This institution, nestled among the hills of the Ozark Mountains, has scarcely passed a year since it was founded, without a gracious revival. This revival in our institutions of learning, is a cause of profound thankfulness to Almighty God. While we are educating the head, we are not neglecting the heart. Our schools are enjoying unusual prosperity. Their boarding capacity is strained to the uttermost. We take great interest in our "Conference Schools," and while we highly appreciate the growing importance of Central College, and will do all we can to advance her interest, we cannot turn a "cold shoulder" to the schools in the midst of our own Southwest Missouri Conference.

The Educational Convention representing the three conferences in Missouri, is to meet in Lexington, Mo., June 27th, and promises to be an occasion of great interest.

You will be glad to learn that we are paying our proportion of the Missionary debt. The announcement will be made before this letter gets into print, that the Southwest Missouri Conference is first to pay her assessment in full for the liquidation of this obligation. As our General Board of Missions is to meet in Kansas City in May, I trust we shall be permitted to grasp your friendly hand once more. Come.

Joseph King.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

THE SENATE has adjourned but office seekers are yet with us. The hotel corridors are full of them. The best place, however, to differentiate the species is around the doors of the Secretary. Here at the proper hour they crowd like fish poking their noses out at an air hole in the ice. The door of the Democratic Congressman is also besieged like a bank during a "run." His bell jingles from 9 a. m. until 9 p. m. The applicant for the country post-office who at home gets up at daylight, is the first caller. His clothes are a misfit, well worn and shiny, his overcoat was in style a decade back, and his well brushed hat is still more ancient. He wears a heavy beard, and a shaggy and unkempt appearance, and pulls the bell with a jerk as if to take it with him. When the door is opened he rushes past the maid as though he owned the house. No chance to tell him "not at home." His visit is generally long and he comes out smoking a cigar from the Member's stock, with a happy expression on his face. At a later hour politicians, apparently from west or south, ride up in carriages. They loll back on the cushions, with legs crossed, cigars tilted up in their mouths and hats on the back of their heads. Evidently they are somebody's influence" whose claims they are pressing. Next arrives a young man, neatly though not stylishly dressed. He stoops and wears glasses. He is a student who wants a position for a few years until he can finish his law course. The next comer, just out of a tailor shop, is most gorgeously gotten up in the extreme of fashion. He wants anything, no matter what, so long as the salary is good and there is little work to do. He is sure of a position, for doesn't his old man carry this Member's district in his inside pocket? Towards evening there is a noticeable change in the style of callers and some have a distinctly metropolitan air, applicants doubtless for some of the foreign plums. The same scene is enacted day after day—some applicants disappear, but others come in their stead—and the procession goes on.

WHERE WILL IT END? Unless there is a change in our customs what hosts will crowd Washington at and after inaugurations fifty years or a hundred hence. Jackson, a British envoy, wrote thus of Washington in 1809: "About twenty rods from the House of Congress I started a covey of partridges." Five years before this, Mrs. Merry, wife of a former British envoy wrote, "We have alarmed Congress by the number of our servants and the immensity of our baggage which they suppose filled with imported luxuries to the injury of home markets. Tomorrow I shall exhibit at the Capitol; Capitol! good heavens what a profanation! And there is a creek too, a dirty arm of the river, which they have dignified by calling it the Tiber." It was of this creek that Tom Moore sang after his visit in 1803.

"And what was Goose creek once is Tiber now,
This famed metropolis, where fancy sees
Squares in morasses, obelisks in trees;
Which traveling fools and gazeteers adorn
With shrines unbuilt and heroes yet unborn."

Well, to-day the loftiest monument looks down upon blocks of noble buildings over the buried Tiber and down upon the statues of heroes of world-wide fame standing in the garden spots which Tom Moore ridiculed as morasses.

CONVICTION.

WHAT IS NEEDED MOST OF ALL TO DAY.

"Conviction is the first equivalent of a teacher. Conviction of truth. It is fashionable to-day not to be sure of anything, except perchance that it is possible to be sure of anything. Such men are not fit to teach anybody or any thing. Conviction, and conviction of the truth, and of the importance of truth to all, is fundamental. Accuracy is one of the hardest things to inculcate, and it is impossible for anyone who has not a very high regard for the overwhelming importance of truth to succeed. Approximations are so easy, and so delusive, and so fatal in their tendency." This is a quotation from an article in the April number of "Christian Thought," written by E. D. Warfield, L L. D., on "the ultimate aim of education. "What is here said we heartily endorse as of prime importance to teachers in every deparment of life, especially preachers. There can be no well ordered life, of transparent character and pure intent, without well defined convictions of the truth with which it stands connected. A strong character of moulding force, is only possible where strong and deep convictio n exists. Teaching that is not supported by conviction is not only wanting in distinctness but in the force to produce and excite desire to obtain the things or states brought to view therein, and hence is destructive of the interests of the taught. An "approximation" is simply an unreached conviction an undefined position that can only support an uninstalled character. Hence the inspired instruction: "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." The preacher that does not pray for a spiritual, realizing understanding of the truths of the Gospel, and thus hold his thoughts in searching intent until they settle down into their divine design, is not a competent teacher of God's word to men. The effectiveness of teaching Gospel truths is more in the strength of conviction than in any rhetorical accomplishment whatever. The teacher is a character maker, as well as a scholar maker, a securer of destiny; especially is this true of the preacher. And how can he build up character in others that will stand the scrutinizing exaction of that "holiness without which no man shall see the Lord," without clear and strong conviction of the truths out of which such a character can alone spring? If there ever was a time when teachers were needed whose thoughts, affections, and purposes were firmly rooted in the truth, and who feel the importance of inculcating it in its purity, it is to-day. For it is indeed "fashionable to-day to not be sure of anything," except it be "that the interests of life are to be found at the expense of established laws and customs.

Lawless liberty and unmerited equality at the instance of "higher criticism" is the craze of the age. "Accuracy," says our author, "is one of the hardest things to inculcate, and it is impossible for any one who has not a very high regard for the overwhelming importance of truth to succeed." Approximations are so easy and so delusive and so fatal in their tendency." Those who extract character-nourishment from the truth through covictions that have settled themselves by persistent effort and prayerful concern, into the conditions of life, can and will appreciate the above wise sayings. And when they look around them and see the lives that are content with an "approximate" relation to truth, having no anchorage thereto through well defined convictions, their souls must be stirred to divinest depths in search of relief for those misguided souls. The tendency of to-day is to abandon the true, the pure, the strong, for shoddy ware, for that which is more specious and easier of attainment. It is one of the manifest tendencies of fallen human nature to spend much of its precious probationary time in "hewing out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." Man when he lifts himself, or rather is lifted, out of conditions of life that are more limited than the truth warrants, is in imminent danger of drifting upon the opposite entrance and being shipwrecked before his conviction has time to anchor itself upon the golden mean. The scope of one's observation is certainly at fault if he fails to see that this is the condition of the present time. The advanced civilization is lifting man out of settled customs and laws that are too strait to secure the interests of those concerned, that imposed restraints, that abridged individual liberty, and that enacted a service that was enslaving and that withheld rewards for services rendered that impoverished, and he is drifting out upon the sea of unsettled conviction. Conjecture, and not conviction, is fast getting control of the interests of man to-day in the civilized world. And the most alarming feature of this unsettled state of human society is that societies are directing the advance movements. And it is a historic fact that where customs or laws are sought to be changed by societies formed for that purpose, that the wildest and most unbridled fanaticism is engendered, and that anarchy along the lines of interests where relief is sought is sure to follow if there is not a reserve force somewhere to prevent it. (And in the approaching revolution, which to us is inevitable, we fail to see a reserve force in human agency to prevent universal anarchy.) When the action of shrewd, wire-working, party-schemers, or fanaticism takes the place of individual conviction, "of the importance of all truth" in correlated relation to each other, the reign of mobocracy or anarchy is imminent. When the leading interests of Society is lodged in societies that are seeking to move them from established relations and conditions, individual convictions that fasten themselves in and utilize life's interests along the lines of human endeavor, are absorbed in the Society Conviction that the panacea for all of life's troubles, are carried within its purposes. "Approximations" to truth in individual life under such a condition of society (which is the most lamentable state into which it can fall,) is inevitable. What we need to-day, most of all, are men and women with strong and deep conviction of truth as it stands related, as a whole, to human interests, and who by their unswerving integrity and clear, forcible instruction bring, if possible, the unsettled, unreached convictions, that characterizes the great, surging, moving mass of human life in the civilized world, to a sure and a safe anchorage in the conditions of life, or of law and order that God, in His law, has provided for our struggling race. R. S. Clark.

You are placed where you are, in a particular business, in a particular street, to help on there the kingdom of God. You cannot do that when you are old and ready to die. By that time your companions will have fought their fight, and lost or won. If they lose, will you not be sorry that you did not help them? Wil you not regret that only at the last you helped the kingdom of God? Perhaps you will not be able to do it then. And then your life has been lost indeed. Very few people have the opportunity to seek the kingdom of God at the end. Christ knowing all that, knowing that religion was a thing for our life, not merely for our deathbed, has laid this command upon us now: "Seek first the kingdom of God."—Prof. Drummond.

Points for Preachers.

There is a good deal of gospel in the right kind of a handshake.

Self-conceited people generally think they can get along without any help from the Lord.

The man who can speak the truth in love will always have something to say that will weigh something.

There are things that look much better from heaven than a butcher's cart or a milk wagon at a preacher's door on Sunday morning.

One reason why there are not more revivals is because so little of the preaching is aimed at the sins of the people who are listening to the preacher.

You can't always tell how much a preacher is doing for the Lord by the size of his salary.

God hasn't much use for a man who does all his work with his mouth.

There are preachers who never want any kind of a revival except that which will make a big show on paper.

A wide awake preacher will be pretty sure to keep his church from going to sleep.

There is no account given any where in the Bible of the conversion of a hypocrite.

——o——

Personal Questions?

If everybody had the same kind of religion that you have would they all love one another?

Is God well pleased with the company you keep?

Is religion a part of your life, or something you can put on and take off, like your Sunday suit?

If you believe the Bible and are not doing anything to get other people to believe it, whose fault will it be if they are lost?

If you know that Christ died for you, are you doing anything to try to show him that you are grateful?

Are you prayerfully reading your Bible and trying to find out what God expects of you?

——o——

We Want to See the Day Come—

When men will work as hard for God as they will for money.

When a wife will not have to hear her husband talk in church to know that he is a Christian.

When men will be as anxious to go to church as they are to make money.

When all Christian parents will realize that their children have souls which need to be saved.

When it will be considered as wicked to try to kill with the tongue as it is with a gun.

When people will know more about he Word of God than they do about the scandals of the neighborhood.

When parents will realize that a good way to train up children in the way they shall go, is to step off in that direction every day themselves.

Loyalty.

During the great battle of Waterloo the commander of a certain regiment or division reported that his men were being mown down like grass before the enemy's guns and asked for orders. "Go back to your post and hold the point at all hazards," was the order given by the "Iron Duke," Wellington. "You will find us there, General," was the response of the brave officer, as he rode away to his command, well aware of the fate in store for him and his comrades. Sure enough, they were found there next day, dead on the field, with their faces to the foe and their lifeless hands clasped in death on sword and bayonet, which they used to the last in defense of their country, and in obedience to the orders of their great commander. Their hearts were true to the last to the cause that they had espoused, and though they fell upon the field, they conquered when they fell. The victory they helped to achieve changed the course of the world's history, and the country they loved unto death is to-day reaping the fruits of their loyalty and devotion to principle and to duty. They were faithful unto death, and received a crown that grows brighter as the years roll on. Had they consulted personal comfort or safety, or swerved one moment when the crisis came, the history of that great conflict might have been entirely different; the geography of the world would possibly have been otherwise than what it is to-day; and their names associated with infamy rather than emblazoned in glory.

Thus it is in every conflict, whether with carnal weapons upon gory fields, or in wrestling against spiritual wickedness in high places, and with weapons that are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds,—loyalty to principle, obedience to authority, submission to discipline is essential to success. Order is not only heaven's first law, but it is essential to all life upon earth, whether physical or spiritual, whether social, municipal, national or ecclesiastical. And there can be no order without loyalty, without discipline. It is to organized bodies what the "joints and bands," and what the heart beats are to the human system; what the centripetal force is to the heavenly bodies, and the law of attraction and adhesion is to the atoms of the material world.

Christ recognized this great law when he made loyalty to Him the great basil principle of His church and the essential condition of membership in it. He says "if any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself, take up his cross and follow Me." "He that loveth father or mother, houses or lands more than Me is not worthy of Me." "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." "He that loveth Me keepeth My commandments." Paul declares love to be "the fulfilling of the law," and that if "a man love not the Lord Jesus let him be anathema maranatha"–accursed.

In proportion as we love Christ, as he has formed in us the hope of glory, will we witness and work for Him, and will He be with us and cause us to triumph over every foe.

A certain general once sent word to the commander of an opposing army whom he supposed to be at his mercy, demanding his surrender. The general to whom the demand was sent, in the presence of the officer bearing the dispatch, called his soldiers around him and ordered one of them to fall upon his sword. He did so and perished. To another he said, "Jump over this precipice." The soldier obeyed orders and was dashed in pieces. "Now," said he, addressing the astounded bearer of the summons, "go back and tell your general that I have an army of men just like those, who will do whatsoever I command them and who will die for me if necessary." He did so and his general changed his tactics and beat a hasty retreat, knowing that a foe so devoted and so well disciplined was invincible. It is this consciousness of the power of Christ to win hearts—to "draw all men unto him"—when he is lifted up—that has prompted predictions of the final and universal triumph of His kingdom of truth and righteousness and love over all the powers of darkness.

Christ offers the highest possible inducements to the soul to supreme loyalty to Him. He makes no unreasonable requirements. Does He demand self-crucifixion? he was crucified for us. Does He require humility and self-abasement? He humbled himself and became obedient unto death. Does He command us to resist temptation? He was tempted in all points like as we are. Does He require suffering? He suffered for us, the just for the unjust. Does He require loyalty even unto death? He first loved us when we were yet enemies and died for us. He endured the contradiction of sinners against himself. Does He require us to give of our substance to His cause? He was rich and became poor that we through His poverty might be rich, and He now freely gives us all things that we enjoy. He has promised to be with us alway, even unto the end, and to give a crown of life at last. If we confess Him before men, He will confess us before His Father and the holy angels. But if we are unfaithful, and are ashamed of Him, of us will He be ashamed before His Father and the holy angels.

Disloyalty to Christ is the great sin of the world. What base ingratitude, what supreme folly to deny the Lord that hath bought us, and count the blood whereby we are sanctified an unholy thing.

If there is one reader of these lines who, through following at a great distance and getting into bad company, like Peter, was ever induced to deny his Lord, may he never rest until with his illustrious and impulsive predecessor, he can say from a full and overflowing heart, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee."

OUR NEXT CONFERENCE.

The next session of the Montana Annual Conference of the M. E. church, South, will be held at Butte City, Montana, commencing May 15th, 1893, and will be presided over by Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald. The Board of Missions at its recent session at Kansas City, Mo., appropriated the sum of $4,000 to this conference for the ensuing year.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

It was our happy privilege on the 26th of April, at 8 o'clock, p. m., 1893, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Alec. Buck, the bride's parents, on Burnt Fork, near Stevensville, Montana, to unite together in the bonds of wedlock, Mr. William A. McLaren and Miss Jennie Buck both of Stevensville, Montana.

The groom is one of the enterprising and substantial young men of Stevensville, and is to be congratulated upon winning the heart and hand of one of Stevensville's most beautiful and accomplished maidens. A select company of invited guests were present to witness the ceremony and to share in the joy of the happy event. Quite a number of appropriate presents testified to the esteem in which the young couple are held. The congratulations were most hearty. All enjoyed the rich repast that was provided.

We join in wishing our young friends the greatest possible happiness and prosperity.

We are deeply pained at hearing of the sad misfortune that has come to our brother S. D. Tuttle, of Fish Creek, Montana. While removing some cloth that was tacked over a hot bed, tearing it off, a tack struck him in the eye, bursting the eyeball. Brother Tuttle is one of the substantial men of that region, and his many friends sympathize with him most deeply.

Brother Goulder, who sent the above note, also informs us that in the same section a young man, Mr. Emerald Johnson, a young man of sterling qualities, lost his life while trying to ride a wild horse. The animal reared up and fell back on him, inflicting injuries from which he died the next day. He was a good boy, about 20 years old, a Swede by birth, a member of the Lutheran church, and only in this country about a year. He was a Christian of the true type. He was not afraid to die. He called his two brothers and his friends around him, bade them good-bye and told them that he was going home. Thank God for a religion that prepares us for both worlds.

At the residence of Esquire J. H. Carls, near Willow Creek, Montana, on the 19th of April, 1893, Mr. Fred Brewster, of Norris, Montana, and Miss Allie Carls were united in marriage, Rev. W. T. Goulder officiating. Our best wishes go with the happy young couple one, of whom we have known from her childhood.

——

Brother R. S. Clark's article in last week's issue contained some excellent food for thought. Without conviction there can be no decisive action. The effort to destroy conviction by "higher criticism" and otherwise, is bearing fruit in the namby-pamby character of much that passes for religion at the present day. The apostle Paul was a man of convictions. What he believed he believed with all his soul, and what he did he did with all his might. When he was a sinner made havoc of the church of God, and when converted, the change was radical, and the cause of God received an impetus that will go on increasing in momentum to the end of time. Oh, for the overshadowing presence of the Holy Spirit to convince man of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.

——

Although the season for special revival effort may be over for the present, we trust that the brethren will not forget to keep us posted as to the progress of the work. There are events that transpire in each pastoral charge every week that would interest our readers. Please note them on a postal—it will take but a minute—and mail it to the Montana Methodist, Corvallis, Montana.

——

Dr. Samuel Rodgers, of Baltimore, has been placed in charge of the editorial columns of the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist. Dr. Rodgers is a deeply spiritual, cultivated and well balanced Christian man, and he will give to the church a strong and excellent paper. The conference is most fortunate in securing his services.

——

While en route to Denver, news reaches us of a fearfully destructive cyclone in Oklahoma, in which 75 or more persons were killed and about 300 injured. The dispatches give the name of Rev. J. M. Corn as among the killed. We are in painful suspense, fearing that the types are wrong and that our dearly beloved brother, Rev. J. M. Gross is the victim.

It is with sorrow that we learn of the prostration of our dear old friend, Rev. D. R. McAnally, D. D., of the "St. Louis Christian Advocate." He is 84 years of age and the oldest editor in Methodism. May the waters be shallow when he is called to pass over.

——

While in Denver we availed ourself of the privilege of hearing Rev. James Duncan, at St. Paul's. Brother Duncan is a young man of medium stature, slender build, florid complexion, red hair and pleasant face. He has his subject well in hand, talks in an easy off hand way, holds attention from beginning to end, and instructs and edifies his hearers. He shows a good knowledge of human nature, and of human life in its different phases, and also of Him who "will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able to bear." Brother D. feels identified with our work in the West, and is hopeful of, and willing to work with his might for its success. He reports that his church of 200 members is united and prosperous. We recognized but two persons in the congregation who were there at the first session of the Denver Conference, held in a little frame building on Curtis street, 19 years ago, when this writer was ordained elder by Bishop Pierce. They were Brothers Strickler and Isaac Brinker.

——

We were most agreeably surprised and delighted at the changes that have been made in Morris Memorial church in Denver since we were there in '84. Then there was just a small chapel out on the prairie, where the houses were very scattering. Now, there is an elegant brick structure with 300 seatings, arranged according to modern architectural plans, with a commodious parsonage and church parlors in connection with it. It is surrounded by a good class of residences. Rev. T. E. Sherwood is the pastor. He is from North Texas Conference, where he has been for 48 years. He is popular with his people, and is doing a fine work. We greatly enjoyed our brief visit with him and his excellent wife at the parsonage.

——

We rejoiced at meeting the editor of the "Rocky Mountain Methodist," the indomitable and indefatigable Rev. George Needham. We were in the office where he writes his spicy paragraphs and has them put in type right under his personal supervision, and wraps them up and sends them out with his own hands. We are gratified to know that the outlook for his paper is brightening and we wish it abundant success, which it richly derserves.

We were constrained to visit again the homes of Brothers Brinker and Rhodes, where we were so royally entertained in 1874, when we were only a boy preacher. These godly men have long been pillars of the church here. Although Aunt Rhodes is over eighty years of age, she says she reads the Montana Methodist through every week, and rejoices in hope of an entrance abundantly into the everlasting kingdom when the Master shall call her home. Surely it is a pleasure to know such characters in this world.

——

We were enjoyed a delightful visit to the home of Sister Morrison, of Morrison Memorial church, at Denver. It was a pleasure to talk over the history of the past and the prospects for the future. The name of this godly woman is as precious ointment poured forth, in scores of homes in Denver. She has an infant class in the Sunday-school that numbers about sixty.

——

The naval exhibit that recently took place near New York, was the greatest display of the kind that the world has ever known. Never such a squadron of powerful iron-clads assembled before. America's navy made a good showing. May all such demonstrations in the future be as peaceable and good natured as this one was.

——

It marked an epoch in the history of our country, and of the world, when on the first of May, President Cleveland, by touching an electric button, in the presence of 300,000 people, opened the World's Fair and set its acres of machinery to whirling and its hundreds of fountains to playing. Not only so, but the news, including the President's speech, was flashed over the world in a moment and was talked of at the breakfast tables in Europe next morning the same as in Chicago. Surely this is the electric age.

——

Read the advertisement of the Union Pacific System which appears in this issue.

——

Colorado is getting the benefit of a railroad war, and there has been quite a cut in rates to the World's Fair. We do not wish the railroads the least harm in the world, but we would rejoice to see a cut in Montana rates that would make it possible for a greater number of our people to attend than will be able to do so under the present regime.

FROM LEWISTON, IDAHO.

"Dear Methodist:"—I wrote you some time ago, that I was trying to organize our Methodism in Lewiston, so far the effort has been a great one, but not a failure. After searching through the town of about fifteen hundred people I found two good sisters who were willing to come in with us and share the results. I added my wife's name to this list, which made three, I then moved the membership of brother Mounce, his wife, and daughter, from our Upper Tammany congregation to Lewiston which made six; and on Sunday, January 15, I organized the class in Lewistown with a full half-dozen members, and preached the first sermon ever preached in Lewistown to a southern Methodist congregation.

Shortly afterward I organized a Sunday School which has up to date 47 enrolled. We have also been adding to our church membership. Whereas, we started with six members, the Lord has given us three by profession of faith and one by certificate which made ten. On Sunday, March 23, we started our protracted meeting. Our good Bro. W. S. Hornbuckle was with us and preached nineteen very strong and effective sermons which resulted in four conversions, five baptized and six accessions to our church, and more to follow. The Lord has been with us all the year, and has blessed us beyond measure. We have now in Lewiston a Sunday School of forty-seven members and a wide-awake church membership of sixteen, as a result of four months' work. The writer hiring a transfer, he did not reach his work until the first quarter had expired. The greatest disadvantage we have is, we have no church building, only as we rent from the Universalist brethren. The prospects for building are not very flattering at present. However we are going to make an effort in the near future. Our congregation at Upper Tammany is moving on nicely. We have added three new members to its roll, since the expiration of the first quarter. They paid $7.10 on the Mission debt, $2.00 for printing minutes, and are coming up nicely on preacher's salary. I have good reasons to believe that the collections will be paid in full. Now, I want to say in conclusion that I am glad that I am among the brethren of the East Columbia Conference. The Lord bless our Conference, and District, and Charge, our homes and hearts.

—W. B. Taylor.

AGAINST INTEMPERANCE

LESSON TEXT.—Prov. 23:29-35.

THE LESSON STORY.

By Cunningham Geikie, D. D., LL. D.

The low round hills of Palestine—low in their elevation above the surrounding country, though from two to three thousand feet above the sea—are peculiarly suited to the growth of the vine. Their soft chalky limestone, dry and warm, supplies the mineral food required, while the temperature, at once warm enough, but also equable, and the moist sea winds which bring the refreshment needed, combine to secure at once abundant and specially high-class vintages. Hence, from the earliest times, the wines of Palestine were famous, and they continued to be so until the Arab conquest, when the introduction of Mohammedanism forbade the use of all intoxicating drinks to those who accepted the new creed.

But the drink of the people of the land was not confined to wine. Fifteen hundred years before Christ, we read in Egyptian inscriptions not only of the wine, but of the beer, of the Holy Land; and the Hebrews, when they came, took fondly to both indulgences. In the Bible, wine, strong drink, and drunkenness are mentioned very often. Wine and the matters connected with it are introduced about a hundred and twenty-five times; "strong drink" is mentioned eighteen times, and drunkenness and drunkards are brought before us at least seventy times.

The Hebrews therefore must have been very far from the sober people we now find in their old land. Yet they had been absolutely total abstainers for the whole forty years they were in the wilderness; for we are told (Deut. 29: 5, 6) that, during all that time, they had "drunk neither wine nor strong drink." The order of Nazarites was instituted by Moses (Num. 6.2) as if to provide a warning and a pattern for the time when the possession of the Promised Land would put strong drink within their reach; and his horror of possible drunkenness among priests was shown by his commanding that they should abstain from even tasting it during the time they were in residence at the tabernacle or temple, for the discharge of their turn of duties.

Like ourselves, the Jews had various intoxicating beverages. There was beer, made from barley, with lupins for hops; cider, which they called "apple-wine;" mead, or "honey-wine," which seems to have been wine mixed with honey and pepper; date-wine, made from the fruit of the palm, which ripens from Gaza south; while still other "wines" were manufactured from figs, millet, pomegranates, and, indeed, from whatever would ferment. But with a divinely instituted total-abstinence society in their midst, from the wilderness days, in the order of Nazarites, and with the warning prohibition laid on the priests, it was clearly the fault of the people themselves if they turned the fertility of these lands, which might have been a blessing, into a curse.

Nor were earnest "temperance speakers" and writers wanting to stimulate the masses to sobriety. The prophets, generation after generation, denounced drunkenness as strongly as any modern lecturer. Turn, for instance, to the following texts: Isaiah 5:22; 19:14; 28:1; Jeremiah 23:9; Isaiah 28:7,8; and look up others in a concordance, for these are only a very few out of many. The Proverbs, embodying the counsels of the best of the Jewish nation, are vigorous in their condemnation of drinking. What, for example, could be more sweeping than the following passage? (Prov. 23:29-35.)

"Who cries 'Ah!' who cries 'Woe's me!' Who has quarrelings? Who has complainings? Who has wounds for which he has given no ground? Who has dark angry flashings of the eyes? They who sit long by the wine; they who go into the house to try strong, mixed, spiced wine." To all the sacred counselor say: "Do not thou even look at the wine, or note how temptingly it shows its red glow in the cup; how smoothly it will glide down. At the last it bites like a serpent, and stings like a hissing viper. Its poison tooth will pour its venom into your blood. Your fevered brain will make your eyes see all manner of fantasies, hideous and horrible, and your heart will speak what will shame and hurt you. Yes, you will, when overpowered by drink, be swallowed up by it, so far as your senses are concerned, and cut off from all your affairs, as the man is who lies drowned in the depths of the sea. Drink, like a devouring flood, will sink you out of all that makes up your life, for the time.

"You put yourself in as much danger if you drink as he does who falls asleep on the wildly shaken top of a mast. It is bad enough on the deck, but in the 'crow's nest' the rolling almost dips the mast in the water, on this side and that, each moment, making it a wonder that one lying in such a place is not hurled into the waves. So the man who is drunk puts himself into a succession of dangers, which, in many different ways, may have a bad ending for him. One would think that all this would make a tippler pause, and give up his folly.

"But, alas! the iron net of 'hab t' has covered him, so that he is helpless in the toils. In spite of all he has suffered, and of all the dangers he has run, he thinks no more of them when his debauch is, for the moment, slept off; and this is indeed the most terrible result of his vice. In his muddled way, he says to himself, 'They beat me, that's true, but I'm none the worse; they cudgeled me, but I did not trouble myself about it. I shall have another sleep, and then, when I wake in the morning, I shall go after that charming wine again, and have another bout.'"

I have amplified the words of Scripture, but have carefully preserved the sense. The difference in some of the renderings is only from a more exact presentation of the full meaning of the Hebrew. No modern picture of the folly and deadly evil of the sin of drunkenness could be more vivid No appeal to give up all use of intoxicants could be more fervent. If we are ourselves sober, is the giving up of all strong drink too great a sacrifice to make for our brother in danger from the public house? If so, what is our love for him worth?—S. S Times.

The Source of Strength

My mother's habit was every day, immediately after breakfast, to withdraw for an hour to her own room, and to spend that hour in reading the Bible, meditation and prayer. From that hour, as from a pure fountain, she drew the strength and sweetness which enabled her to fulfill all her duties, and to remain unruffled by all the worries and pettishnesses which are so often the intolerable trial of narrow neighborhoods. As I think of her life, and of all it had to bear, I see the absolute triumph of Christian grace in the lovely ideal of a Christian lady. I never saw her temper disturbed, I never heard her speak one word of anger, of calumny, or of idle gossip; I never observed in her any sign of a single sentiment unbecoming to a soul that had drunk of the river of the water of life, and which had fed upon manna in the barren wilderness. The world is the better for the passage of such souls across its surface. They may seem to be as much forgotten as the drops of rain which fall into the barren sea, but each drop adds to the volume of refreshful and purifying waters. "The healing of the world is in its nameless saints. A single star seems nothing, but a thousand scattered stars break up the night and make it beautiful."—Farrar.

—o—

SELF SEEKING.

Away with it! It is misery, it is death. Miserable indeed, is the Christian who lives for self. Unhappy is the follower of Jesus who so far forgets the example of his Master as to go in for a life of self seeking. This leads to judging, censoriousness, to narrowness, to bigotry, to Phariseeism, to spiritual death. Give as God gives, to the just and unjust. Love everybody. Live for everyone else. Deny self! Become poor that others may be rich. Don't self-seek in prayer. Get out of self; get into others. Beware of being good and doing good—for returns. Christ-i-anity is so different from what is taught. Christ life,—among the poor, those who cannot repay; among the degraded, those who are not worthy; among the debased, despised, rejected of men. Harlots, libertines, drunkards, publicans, sinners. Salvation in Jesus' name! Salvation for the lost! Salvation by your hand! Burst your petty but ruinous bonds of seeking honor, ease, praise, place, money, name or fame, among men. Be free from the terrible bondage of self—live for others. Give until it hurts, of time, and means, and reputation.

—o—

SIT DOWN, YOUNG MAN.

When William Carey died he was known as a very successful missionary. What an humble start he had, though! He was poor in purse, but rich in the desire for knowledge. When a man he cobbled shoes on Saturday, but preached on Sundays. "Second-Hand Shoes Bought and Sold, William Carey"—that was the sign under which he worked when thirty years old.

Something besides old shoes, though, could be found in his shop. Look at the wall! On it was a map, roughly sketched, the work of Cobbler Carey. Various items in the world's statistics were spread out on this rude drawing. On a heap of scraps of leather were some of Cobbler Carey's books. Look at them! What! French, Latin, strange characters in Greek, queerer ones in Hebrew. Yes; all in this rude cobbler-shop.

He had a burning desire to get the light of the knowledge of Christ to the dark heathen world. He expressed his opinion to a meeting of preachers. They did not give him sympathy. On the other hand, he met rebuke. The presiding officer flung the title "miserable enthusiast" at him. It is said they shouted at him, "Sit down!"

But William Carey was not the one to be suppressed and to sit down; he was the very one to stand up. He persisted in his ideas. Others, at last, stood up with him, and William Carey's destiny turned a corner.

In connection with India, his labors will always be gratefully remembered.

What a difference, though, it would have made if he had taken his seat to keep it in dumbness—to be a block, a silent show, a mouth with a padlock on it! He was not that kind of a Carey.

The world wants young men and women also. It wants those, however, with a purpose, with a tongue to express it, and resolution to maintain their position. Oftentimes the only difference between one man's success and another's failure is simply this: Not a difference of ability; but the first man will not "sit down," and the second will. One has energy and persistence. The other lacks energy, while he possesses an abundance of persistence in keeping still and doing nothing. God wants in people not only ideas, but their active, enthusiastic interest, and their refusal to "sit down."—Golden Rule.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM CORVALLIS TO KANSAS CITY.

Thursday morning, the 27th of April at 7.30 o'clock, was the time set for our departure on a trip to Kansas City, Missouri, via Denver, Colorado. We had traveled nearly 40 miles in an open buggy through snow and rain with raiment saturated to the skin, the day and night previous, arriving home at 1. 30 o'clock, a. m., and were not in extraordinary trim for such an early start. Added to this, upon looking out of our window, the entire face of nature was covered with a white mantle, and the snow was still coming down. Visions of belated blizzards and blockaded, snow-bound passenger trains amid the canyons of the Rockies flitted before us, half tempting a postponement of our journey. But remembering past experiences, we bade our doubts depart, kissed wife and wee ones good-bye and was in good time for the 8.15 train at Woodside, bound for Missoula. The snow was only a skiff which the rising sun dispersed and revealed fields of green just starting to grow, and landscapes verdant and variegated with bluebells and buttercups. Many farmers along the valley were busy putting in their crops.

It was not until we were about entering the court-house yard at Missoula, with a marriage certificate for the county archives, that we remembered that the people of Upper Bitter Root Valley have no more dealings officially with the western metropolis, and that Stevensville is now the official center of Ravalli county where all legal documents are filed for record. While county division—the cutting off of Flathead and Ravalli counties from Missoula—may not materially affect the business of the central city, yet we could notice the conspicuous absence of many faces at hotels and on the sidewalks. There was complaint of dull times.

A deranged time-piece caused us to miss the 1.30 train for Butte, which however gave us a few hours for work on matters connected with the paper. We have learned to carry our "work" along with us, and are not so seriously disturbed by delays as formerly. It is no trouble to put in the time.

It was a great satisfaction to meet with Judge Woody at the hotel, and hear him talk for an hour or more about his early experience in the West and Northwest. He came from North Carolina, drove a team across the plains to Salt Lake in 1855, then to the Hell-gate Valley, just below where Missoula now stands, in '56, working for $20. a month, and for his board part of the time. He helped to make the abode brick for the walls of old fort Owen, near Stevensville. The story of his hardships sounds like a romance. He is now one of our most eminent and honored citizens.

We left Missoula at 6.15 a. m., and arrived at Butte just at midday. The country around was covered with snow, and the streets were almost impassable to a footman off the sidewalk, on account of the mud.

We repaired at once to the office of E. V. Maze, the general passenger agent of the Union Pacific system, to secure our ticket. He is gentlemanly and obliging in his manner, and we acknowledge our indebtedness for courtesies at his hands.

We found Brother Alton and his bachelor friend Chambers (we told him that misery loved company) at the parsonage figuring on printing the Montana Methodist next year, and ready to make propositions which we think will enable us to greatly increase the usefulness of the paper, by publishing it nearer home.

Butte is pre-eminently a mining town. It is by far the largest city in Montana, and one of the solidest and liveliest towns, financially, in the Northwest. But there is little else that renders it attractive. On a bleak, rocky mountain slope, with hundreds of furnaces belching forth their poisonous contents that settle in cloudy masses about the city, there is but little that is inviting to the stranger. But the immense piles of shining solid silver bricks on the platform that are loaded on to our train, in the express car, carry with them a charm that is irresistible and that "draws."

We heard that all the bodies of the men recently suffocated in the mine there had not yet been recovered.

At 3:30 our well equipped train pulled out from the Montana Union Depot, and we were soon past Silver Bow Junction, and climbing the slope of the main range, by the Silver Bow pass. Twenty minutes for supper at Melrose. We reached Dillon, a beautiful little town, in Beaverhead Valley, the county seat of Beaverhead county, and the seat of the State Normal University, about sundown. During the day we had the company of Mr. J. R. Gilbert, whom it was our happy lot to join in matrimony to a handsome young lady., Miss Bumby, some sixteen years ago. Since then our friend has acquired a handsome fortune and has been blessed with a happy family of only nine children. It was a pleasure to meet him again. His home is near Dillon. It was in a little log house near this place that we ate our first meal at a table in Montana, in 1871.

Night came on before we crossed the main range again, near Pleasant Valley, into Idaho. Very many incidents that transpired during our journeys on horseback and stage in days gone by are called to mind, but we cannot stop to relate them now.

Next morning at 8.30 we were in Ogden, Utah, when the Texans Missts sippi Convention had just closed its session, which was somewhat stormy, especially when discussing the Utah statehood question. Here was the first verdure we have seen since leaving home. At 9 oclock we pulled out from the depot, passing en route the familiar Thousand Mile Tree, the Devil's Slide and other scenes, in Weber and Echo canyons, which once enthused and thrilled us, but which now appear very tame. It is because they are so far inferior to our Montana scenery, we suppose.

A snow storm raged, and the ground was covered with "the beautiful," almost from the time we left Ogden until our arrival in Denver the following morning, at about 8 o'clock. The monotony of the journey was greatly relieved by meeting with Mr. Pierce, his wife and accomplished daughter, of Horse Plains, Montana, who are on their way to the World's Fair, taking in the places of interest en route.

What a change in Denver since we first visited it by this same route of travel, though requiring six days for the journey their instead of two, 19 years ago, then it numbered 20,000 people, now its population is estimated at 150,000. Then its street cars were of the plainest kind, drawn by horses, now a net work of cable and electric lines thread street and avenue for miles and miles, and thousands of people fairly fly in elegant coaches wherever they would go. This has been aptly styled the "Queen City of the West." and the "queen" is still growing and extending her influence and power.

After spending several days most delightfully with our sister, Mrs. L. D. Hart, and family whom we had not seen for several years, and visiting other friends, on Wednesday evening at 8:30, we boarded the crowded train of the Union Pacific (on the K. P. line) and started for Kansas City, at which place we are due on Thursday, at 5 o'clock p. m. The distance is 639 miles, the time 20 hours and a half, or 30 miles an hour. This is faster time than usual for such a long distance in the West. It may very appropriately be termed the "Overland Flyer" or the "Cannon Ball" train.

When we awoke on Thursday morning our eyes were greeted with a wide waste of prairie, brown and barren, scarcely a sprig of grass or a green thing beside, in sight. But at this writing—10 o'clock a. m. we have reached Saline and are gliding down the broad Smoky Hill Valley where the prairies are green, the trees are covered with foliage, the winter wheat is four or six inches high, and farmers are busy listing ground and planting corn. The country improves in appearance as we go eastward. In fact, there is much of the beautiful in Kansas, with its rolling prairies, dotted with groves coursed by timber-fringed streams, studded with towns and villages, and interspersed with blooming orchards, and it would really be a good place to live, but for its zephyrs, cyclones, chinch bugs, drouths and other plagues that so frequently beset it. As we write, the clouds hang dark and lowering, the south west wind is blowing a gale and who knows but that our train will be swept from the track and its passengers ushered into another world before five o'clock p. m.? Be this as it may, we trust in the mercy of our gracious Heavenly Father, who has brought us safe thus far, and go forward, hoping to reach Kansas City in time for the reception to be given to the members of the Board of Missions at Centenary church at 7:30 o'clock this evening, the 4th of May, 1893.

JOHN WESLEY'S DEATH.

Within the last few months many of our eminent men have passed from earth. To some it is given to catch glimpses of the glories beyond while still lingering in the lowlands of earth, and leaves testimonies of peace and joy for the comforting and strengthening of their brethren. Others are called in a moment from service to reward, leaving only the best of all testimony—the record of a noble Christian life. We know not which is better; doubtless, both are needed for the upbuilding of the Church in faith and righteousness. In the case of so prominent a man as John Wesley, it is at least a cause for devout thankfulness that he has left so clear a record of his faith and hope in his last hours.

One month before John Wesley died he was so deeply interested in his societies as ever before. He was then 88 years old, and still visiting and preaching. February 27th, while he was sitting in his chair, he said, quoting from one of Charles Wesley's hymns:

"Till glad I lay this body down,
Thy servant, Lord, attend!
And, oh, my life of mercy crown
With a triumphant end!"

On March 1st, on being asked if he suffered pain, he answered, "No;" and began singing—

"All glory to God in the sky,
And peace upon earth be restored!
O Jesus, exalted on high,
Appear, our omnipotent Lord!"

Then he said, "I want to write;" but when a pen was given him he could not use it, and his friend, Mrs. Ritchie, said: "Let me write for you. What do you wish to say?" "Nothing," he said, "but that God is with us." He wished to get up, and while his friends were helping him he began singing—

"I'll praise my Maker while I've breath,
And when my voice is lost in death,
Praise shall employ my nobler powers."

Being seated, he said a few words, and then began singing again—

"To Father, Son and Holy Ghost,
Who sweetly all agree."

Those around him were weeping, and he said, "Pray and praise!" They did so at once, and after a little while he made the request again, and after a season of prayer shook hands with each one, saying, "Farewell! farewell!" After making some requests which they could not understand, he paused, and summoning all his strength, said in a voice that seemed supernatural, "The best of all is, God is with us;" and then, after a pause, lifting up his arm in grateful triumph, he emphatically said, "The best of all is, God is with us."

His brother's widow came in, and he thanked her affectionately, saying, "He giveth his servants rest;" and then: "We thank thee, O Lord, for these and all thy mercies. Bless the Church and king, and grant us truth and peace, through Jesus Christ our Lord, forever and ever!" After a little while he said, "The clouds drop fatness." "The Lord of Hosts is with us, and the God of Jacob is our refuge! Pray and praise!"

During the night he said a number of times, "I'll praise! I'll praise!" evidently trying to repeat Watt's glorious hymn. Eleven persons stood around his bed about 10 o'clock March 2, 1791. Wesley cried distinctly, "Farewell!" and as Joseph Bradford was saying, "Lift up your heads, oh, ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors," and this heir of glory shall come in! "Mr. Wesley, without a groan and without a sigh, was gone." The little company sang—

"Waiting to receive thy spirit,
Lo! The Saviour stands above;
Shows the purchase of his merit;
Reaches out the crown of love."

And then they prayed that the mantle of Elijah might rest upon his followers.

Do not wait for extraordinary opportunities for good actions, but make use of the common situations.

"What is the matter with my dear children? Have I alarmed you? O, do not cry. Be good children, and we will all meet in heaven."—Andrew Jackson.

Steady.

For as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God. Children, heirs, co-workers together with Him. Be led by the Spirit; be filled with Him; and have the sweet and continued abiding assurance that He dwells in you. Don't run before you are sent, don't run without a message; don't make your own tidings. Steady! don't run so fast as to leap the track; keep to the Law and Testimony. "Sanctify them through Thy truth; Thy word is truth." His blessed Word is a light and lamp to our feet and guide to our path. The Holy Illuminator will guide us into all truth. Be not wise above what is written. Steady! Steady! Ask for the old paths and walk therein. Not man's ways; not the traditions of men; not in the bondage of the law; not in the light of the eye, or the pride of life, but in the simplicity of the gospel; in the highway cast up, in the way of faith, of assurance, of obedience. Steady! Beloved, Steady! Not carried away with every wind of doctrine. Try! Prove the Spirit if these things be so. Steady! don't judge, no harsh words, keep sweet. If it is not of God it will come to naught. Let the Holy Spirit work; work in his own way; don't think all wisdom will die with you. Leave it to Him, trust Him with His own Word, work, way. Steady! keep cool, calm, collected.

Lend a Hand.

Where? How? Each in his own sphere whether that sphere may be in a permanent place or in one of temporary sojourn. There is no spot on this planet where any of God's intelligent creatures can divest himself of his responsibilities, or innocently shirk the performance of his duties. Everywhere he must lend a hand in the furtherance of God's cause, in the advancement of his kingdom, and in the saving of souls. In deciding how this can best be furnished, he must take into consideration his own talents, adaptability and environments. What is duty to one in certain circumstances may not be duty to another. God gives to every man his own work, the work for which God has qualified him, to which he has called him, and for the performance of which he will hold him accountable.—The Treasury.

There is an enduring tenderness in the love of a mother to a son that transcends all other affections of the heart. It is neither to be chilled by selfishness, nor daunted by danger, nor weakened by worthlessness, nor stifled by ingratitude. She will sacrifice every comfort to his convenience; she will surrender every pleasure to his enjoyment; will glory in his fame and exult in his prosperity; and if adversity overtakes him he will be the dearer to her by misfortune; and if disgrace settle upon his name she will still love and cherish him; and if all the world besides cast him off she will be all the world to him.—Washington Irving.

A Great Work.

It is a great work to lead souls to Christ; but it is no greater than to care for them after they have been accepted of him.

How hard we labor, how almost incessantly we pray for the conversion of sinners! Yet how indifferent we often are toward young Christians struggling with temptations! How austere in our judgment of him who, in an unwanton hour, has yielded to sin and fallen! Christ reaches down his gentle hand and bids the Davids and Peters rise, and gladly accepts and blesses them more abundantly than before, if they call on him in a contrite spirit. Let us, too, sympathize with, pray for, and kindly advise these babes in Christ in their first efforts to walk the straight and narrow way, and we shall be doing a great work.

A Little Prayer "Upon Wheels.'

Many years ago a good clergyman wrote a tiny prayer, so short that no one could help remembering if it they once heard it. God seemed to set that little prayer "upon wheels," so that it might run everywhere. It was printed on large cards and hung up, and it was printed on small ones and kept in Bibles and pocketbooks. In was taught to classes and schools and whole congregations, and now thousands and thousands pray it constantly. It is a prayer which must be heard, because it asks for what God has promised to give, and it asks for this through him whom the Father heareth always. It is this: "O God, give me thy Holy Spirit, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen." Will you not pray it, too? Begin this morning, and go on; not just saying it, but praying it, till you get a full answer. For you are quite sure to get it; here is God's own promise: "I will put my Spirit within you;" and he has promised it over and over again in other places.—Frances R. Havergal.

Reaching People With the Gospel.

The way to reach them is to reach them. The gospel has lost none of its power. It is efficacious in the case of the most hardened sinners. As our Lord cast the legion of evil spirits out of the man of Gadara in the days of his flesh, so he can now break the bands of sin with which men are bound and set them free. The reason more are not saved is because they do not come or are not brought to Jesus. Too many ministers and other workers to-day are like the disciples who could not cast the dumb spirit out of one who was brought to him. Christ rebuked the faithlessness of these followers of his, and at the same time taught his people an ihvaluable lesson when he said to the father of that child, "Bring him to me." That is the secret of reaching men. We must get near to them. We must take them by the hand, and lift them up, and point them to the Lamb of God. --Religious Telescope.

INFLUENCE.

The magic word in the vocabulary of political circles at Washington City is influence. An applicant for position from page to secretary is successful to the degree he can muster it. But the one question is asked: "Has he influence?" That means how many and what the character of his friends. How do they stand with members of Congress, with cabinet and President? If friends are numerous, and there is quality in the number, the door opens and he walks in. Now, "influence" is the word needed in church work Not the force which comes from money, though that is important; nor from social position, though that is weighty; we speak of that which does good independent of and in spite of wealth and tone, and call it influence with God. A life so consecrated, so imbued with prayer, saintlessness, love, activity, sweetness which are the fruits of fellowship with him, that the world and the church will recognize the qualities. It is a compliment to the church-member claiming nothing of "this world's goods" or social prestige, to have it said, "he is as good as his word," "he is the man to whom I would commit my child in the Sabbath-school," "he has Christian worth," "I can trust him." How valuable is such to the pastor in times of revival! What an inspiration in his prayers, and exhortations with sinners! Sum it all up in that word influence. "As a prince he has power with God and men, and has prevailed." He is in favor with the divine administration."—Pulpit and Pew.

Changeless One.

Lover! Friend! Brother! Husband! ever the same. Everything changes; He changes not. A changeless lover is He. He loves with an everlasting love. He loves to the end. I was in bondage of fear many, many years of my experience lest that after having preached to others I might myself become a a cast away; that my serious lack of continuity would sometime, under peculiar circumstances, lead me to let go my confidence, unship my faith, and I, back to the beggarly elements of the world would be found with no oil in my vessel when death overtook, or the Bridegroom came. It was a nightmare of anguish at times; but then I was looking to myself, hence the danger, difficulty, despair. The Holy Ghost brought to my remembrance the dear words of Jesus: 'Lo I am with you, alway,' and the song: "They are all taken away, to stay" was made a wonderful blessing. The Changeless One is full of Love. "His nature and His name is Love," and He is adapted to our race, adequate for any and every time of need. He is a continuity of Love, a constancy of affection, a very present help in time of need. He is an unflinching and unfailing friend of every human soul who trusts in Him. He never leaves or forsakes. All through the vicissitudes of the ever changing scenes of this inconstant life, this changeless love abounds; and it is so powerful that no weapon formed can prosper against it; that no combination of forces, ever so evil, ever so strong, can prevail over it.

CHURCH LOYALTY.

We would not be understood as substituting loyalty to the church for loyalty to Christ. No, not in the least. It has ever been a characteristic of Methodist teaching and effort to exalt Christ, to get men and women converted to Christ, and first of all to be loyal to Him. But while this is the case, and while we would not for the world have them abate their zeal along this line one iota, yet we fear that they have failed in many cases to inspire them with the importance of loyalty to the church organization with which they have become identified. After a man is converted to Christ, or has made up his mind positively, to live a Christian life, his next duty is to identify himself with the visible church—some organization of Christian people. If there is none at hand which exactly accords with his ideas of Bible teaching, then let him choose that which is nearest his ideal—in which he can feel most at home and where he honestly thinks he can labor with the greatest zeal and efficiency and do the most good.

The next thing, while not neglecting the study of God's Word, is to familiarize himself with the discipline of the church and address himself with all his might to the lines and methods of work laid out therein. One great secret of the great success of Methodism has always been that it gave every member something to do and expected him to do it. As a rule, the more familiar a man becomes with these methods of work, the more he will fall in love with them.

But, however much a man may think of his church, he should avoid bigotry—that Pharisaic spirit which our Lord condemned in such unmeasured terms. There is no one organization upon this earth that contains or can contain a monopoly of Christian people or of divine grace. The disciples found those who cast out devils in Christ's name, and, just as many would do to-day, forbade them, "because they followed not us." But if the Master rebuked them for such exclusiveness, and said, "forbid them not," "for they that are not against us are for us."

But, after all, the church of Christ in the world is the body of Christ. He is its Head; it is "His body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all." It is His witness, His representative; through its many members it is to testify of Him, and do the work that He would do if He were still upon the earth in person. While, as we have said, no one organization may expect to attain perfection, much less claim a monopoly, yet it is the privilege and duty of every general and local church organization to strive to approximate to this standard—to press toward this mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. In it the pure word of God is preached, both to those at home and to those in foreign lands, as far as possible, and the ordinances are administered according to the command of Christ.

This is accomplished by organization and united and concentrated effort. Hence, every person who unites with the Methodist church promises to "attend upon the ordinances of the church and to support its institutions." This means that each member is expected to be present at all the regular services of the church when ever it is at all practicable to get there, and then by his influence and prayers, and by giving of his earthly substance as the Lord hath prospered him, to the support of its ministry, to building churches, to missions, to educa tion, and to such other institutions as may be under its care for carrying forward the Lord's work.

These vows are perfectly reasonable and consistent. And it is only by loyalty to them that the church can successfully carry forward its grand work. It sends forth its ministers and its missionaries, relying upon the fulfillment of these promises made by its members. And unfaithfulness here, either upon the part of the ministry in going and preaching, or upon the part of the church in "attending and supporting" is the cause of the sad failures that have been made in the past, causing the banner of the cross to trail in the dust, when it should have waved in triumph over fields of victory.

In some cases the people pay and pray and attend the place of worship for weeks and months without seeing the pastor in their homes. While a trivial excuse—a shower or a snowfall—will keep him from filling his appointment. But in very many cases the preacher is found regularly at church, at Sunday-school and at prayer-meeting and denying himself the comforts and even necessaries of life, that he may serve the people; while, alas! many of those who have promised to stand by him and help him, are visiting or receiving visitors and having a jolly time on the Lord's day, or possibly attending services at another church, while they have entirely neglected to pay a dollar into the treasury of the church that they solemnly promised to support. How these things sicken and sadden the heart and weaken the hands of true ministers of the Lord Jesus Christ.

There are people who are much afraid of sectarianism, and who think it evinces wonderful unselfishness to affirm that they regard one church just as good as another, and that they will give as much to one church as another. The fact is that such people are not apt to be burdened with overmuch love for any of the churches, and their giving is in accord with their loving.

We try to love everybody and every family in our great land, in a measure, but we confess to having a stronger attachment for our own family than for any other, and we claim to be none the less patriotic for it. So, while there are many in all our sister churches who are working so earnestly for the salvation of men that commands our admiration, and we love Christian people wherever we find them, yet we are no less a Christian and lover of our Lord Jesus Christ because we confess to a more ardent love for the Methodist than for any other families of Christians. And we believe the Lord smiles with approval upon our gifts and our labors, when bestowed, as all should be, with a desire for His glory and the advancement of His cause, just the same as if Christ were upon earth in person, and they were given to him or performed under his direction. We honor a Baptist all the more for being true to his convictions, and a Presbyterian the same.

It is high time that our people in Montana and elsewhere in this great West should awake to a sense of the responsibility resting upon them in the effort to possess this land for Christ. We would not antagonize other bodies of Christian people, but by a closer organization and a more ardent devotion to the principles and usages by which we have gained such glorious victories in the past, let us gird ourselves anew for the conflict, with charity for all and malice toward none, and with supreme love for the great Captain of our salvation, and a soul-consuming zeal for the salvation of men, let us occupy our place in the ranks of God's great army of valiant soldiers and go forth "conquering and to conquer."

THE MEETING OF THE BOARD OF MISSIONS.

The session of the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South, recently held at Centenary Church in Kansas City, Mo., was one of the most interesting meetings in its history. It never had before assembled in a place so near the setting sun, and as it brought together the college of bishops, together with other prominent men of the church, a large number of preachers, and some laymen from the surrounding country, including members of the Missouri, St Louis, Southwest Missouri, Western Indian Mission Conferences, including some preachers from Arkansas, were attracted thither to see and hear what was going on. The fact is, that this is the most important board created by the General Conference. It represents our great church from center to circumference. It levies assessments upon the strong to help the weak and hears reports from and supervises the work in every field. The proceedings were held in the auditorium of one of the best churches in the city, and the public was invited to attend. The congregations were, for the most part, large, and a good degree of interest was manifested in the proceedings.

The first public meeting was a formal reception on the part of the church in Kansas City, on Thursday evening, at Centenary Church. Dr. J. E. Godbey delivered the address of welcome, rehearsing briefly the history of Kansas City, and particularly the history of our church, showing its wonderful growth during the past twenty years. This was responded to by Bishop Keener, after which speeches were made by Rev. J. L. Kennedy, of the Brazil Mission, and Rev. D. L. Anderson, of the China Mission, in which each spoke of the condition and needs of the work in his field. Mr. Kennedy is a young man of good appearance and manner, and is greatly interested in rescuing Brazil from the clutches of Roman Catholicism. Rev. D. L. Anderson is just in the prime of life, wears a long flowing beard, has a commanding appearance, a splendid voice, is deeply in earnest, and holds the attention of his audience from first to last. He made a good impression. The house was well filled. After the addresses, a half hour or so was devoted to hand shaking and social conversation in the church parlors adjoining the auditorium.

The Board met in business session at 9 o'clock, a. m., May 5, 1893. In the absence of E. W. Cole, President, Rev. P. A. Peterson occupied the chair. In the absence of Dr. I. G. John, corresponding secretary, who was sick, Dr. Lambuth acted in his place. There was a good, though not a full, attendance. The Board decided to meet at 9 a. m., and adjourn at 1 p. m., and meet at 2 p. m. and adjourn at pleasure. The ladies of the church served an elegant lunch at one o'clock, in the church parlors for the members and visitors, so that but little time was lost. Hence, the rapidity with which business was dispatched, enabling the body to reach an adjournment on the evening of the second day—much earlier than was anticipated.

The committee on estimates reported the financial status of the Board, March 31, 1893, to be as follows: Collections under regular assessment, $264,351.20; Specials, $74,620.74; total collections from all sources, $338,971.94. Liabilities of the Board for borrowed money, $67,964.06.

It will thus be seen that the collections on the regular assessment have not only not fallen short, but actually have exceeded those of the preceding year by $904.09, and that after paying interest amounting to $11,241.50. The indebtedness of the Board for borrowed money has been reduced to $61,049.82.

The amount of $412,050 was asked for by the superintendents of the various mission fields throughout the church. But the Board was limited in its action by a resolution passed at Wilmington two years ago, requiring appropriations for the ensuing year to be within the amount collected on the regular assessments the previous year. Acting in accordance with this, the committee had recommended appropriations to the various fields amounting to $259,576.

The various fields, commencing with those in foreign lands, were gone over in detail, and these figures, with some few modifications were confirmed.

When each field was called the Bishop in charge represented the work in that field.

When the Pacific and Los Angeles Conferences were called, Bishop Haygood gave a general statement of the work there. He told how, two years ago, he had supplied various needy fields in Southern California with noble, self-sacrificing young men without one dollar of expense to the Board. These men had left charges where they were well cared for and were now getting a bare subsistence, and appealed to the Board for an increase of at least $1,000 to the Pacific Conference and $2,000 to the Los Angeles Conference for the relief of these men who were doing such valiant service in planting our church in that important field.

This motion brought out the liveliest discussion of the session. It was known that if this action were taken, it would involve a proportionate increase to each one of the conferences in the West and Northwest, and in view of the rule forbidding the appropriation to exceed a definite amount, and as the Board had already reached its limit' in its appropriations to the foreign field, the only way to obtain the amount was by scaling from the foreign field. The question was raised, as to whether the Board should go on endorsing the action of the committee on estimates or should assert its right to amend that report and make appropriations on its own responsibility. It was the conflict that for many years we have been awaiting and expecting to see. It brought out strong men on both sides, and the importance and demands of our work in the West were made prominent. It was urged that while we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to save the people of Mexico and Brazil from the corruption of the Romish church that was planted there hundreds of years ago, it was equally important to save the West from being dominated by the same corrupt system that is seeking to plant itself in our own land. Also, that while we have spent more than a half million of dollars to convert the heathen in China, we ought to do more to convert those who are flocking from foreign climes to seek homes and fortunes in the great West and Northwest.

In the meantime the Board adjourned. At the next session a special committee, consisting of C. P. Fitzgerald, T. M. Finney, and E. J. Stanley, brought in a report covering the ground, asking for $10,000 to be "scaled" from the general appropriation and added to the Western work. The report was lost by a vote of 13 to 12. If good Bishop Duncan, who afterwards made a strong and telling speech for the Western work, had voted for the report instead of against, it would have carried. His explanation was, that he was in hearty sympathy with the West, but he thought it would inflict untold injury on the work in other fields to have this amount scaled from them just now. This was the case with others. After all, we feel gratified at the result, and we doubt not that at the next meeting of the Board, relief will come, and a new impetus will be given to the work in our needy Western fields. Let our noble men who have worked and waited so long [some of them have waited twenty years or more] try and squeeze through "this year also," and we believe they will get relief.

The Board made the same assessment upon the various conferences as last year, asking for $350,000 in all. The assessment on the Montana Conference is $400; Columbia, (including, we presume, the East Columbia conjointly) $1200.

Below we give the list of appropriations to the various missions for the ensuing year. There are other items that we would take pleasure in giving if we only had the space. We may present them at another time.

THE EXCELLENT WOMAN.

LESSON TEXT.—Prov. 31:10-31.

THE LESSON STORY.

By Cunningham Geikie, D. D., LL. D.

The Book of Proverbs very suitably closes with a eulogy, in poetical form, of the ideal wife (Prov. 31 : 10-31). The first nine verses of the chapter are ascribed to an unknown personage,—"Lemuel, a king." The word translated "the prophecy" in our version is made a proper name by some, so as to read "of Massa;" but as no kingdom of that name is known, the emendation does not tell us much.

The poem that follows is constructed so that each verse begins with the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet,—a peculiarity recurring in Psalms 9 and 10 and the four first chapters of the Book of Lamentations. It seems to have been early in fashion among Hebrew poets, for some critics ascribe the Ninth and Tenth Psalms to the age of David; others, to the time of the fall of Nineveh, or to the era after the exile. The eulogy on the virtuous woman as part of the sections of Proverbs "which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out" (Prov. 25 : 1), may reasonably be set down as very old, since the collection was made up of "proverbs" esteemed ancient in Hezekiah's day.

"A virtuous woman," that queen of wives, may be found; but pearls are more easily got than she, and she surpasses their exceeding worth, as the rarely fortunate husband finds. The sense in which the term "virtuous is used may be gathered from the good qualities extolled, as marking the wife thus described. She is immensely active, devotedly domestic, skillful in managing her household, a clever business woman, thoroughly sensible, gracious to all, careful to wake kindly feeling to every one, and, above all,—indeed, as the root of all,—"a woman that feareth Jehovah."

The heart of her husband can trust her absolutely, and gain by her labor will not fail him. The word for "husband," by the way, is "her Baal;" that is, "her lord." She will do him good, not hurt, all the days of her life. How she will do so is now shown. She busies herself getting in wool and flax, and, having secured a stock of them, she works them up with a joy even her hands share. Woolen cloth was the staple material of clothing among the Jews (Lev. 13 : 47; Deut. 22 : 11; Job 31 : 20; Ezek. 34 : 3; Hosea 2 : 5). Linen of various degrees of fineness was also much used, as may be judged from no fewer than five words being found in Scripture for it. At present, cotten has taken the place of linen in the East to a very large extent; but in old times we find "linen garments" and girdles, winding sheets, towels, napkins, etc., mentioned (Judg. 14 : 12-13; Isa. 3 : 23; Mark 15 : 46; John 11 : 44; 13 : 4 5) of linen. To prepare either wool or flax for making cloth implies a great many processes, so that, even from this one source, the wife would have no little to fill up her time.

As merchant ships, not content with what can be had near at hand, sail off afar, to spy out and use new markets, so the wife of our poem looks out over a wide range for chances of some advantage in selling her webs, and is careful to secure it when discovered; thus in a very practical sense "bringing her food from afar."

At this day a wife in the peasant cabins of Palestine rises to fill her wretched lamp with oil while it is still dark, and does not think of lying down again, as the barley has to be ground for the day's bread, and the bread itself baked. Her husband may sleep on, but for her there is no more rest. The "virtuous woman," like her, rises before the sun, and sets the mill stones to work, to "give meat to her household," though she is painted as, fortunately, having "maidens" (that is, slave-girls), to whom she thus early sets their various tasks for the day, and among these, we may hope, the heavy labor of grinding, which was far more suitable work for them than for the house-mother.

But the ideal wife is not contented to manage her household, and let her husband attend to investments of any gain she may make over household expenses. She takes a fancy to a piece of ground, and buys it with her profits in trade. Still more, she turns it into a vineyard, paying the cost from the same hoards. Nor is it any wonder she makes money thus; for she girds herself round with energy, and makes her arms strong by her constant industry,—words which point to her life as spent in physical labor of the kind now left to men, or to women in a very humble position. She "likes the taste of her gains," and, to make more, she works all through the night, her lamp being kept burning till morning.

Any one living for a time in an Italian or Sicilian village will see the women standing on the top of their stair-wall, or other slight elevation, letting fall a distaff, trimmed with its oval of tow, twirling, as the thread is twined for weaving, in multitudinous revolutions. This is part of what the "virtuous woman" does, presumably through the night; winding up the yarn as it is twisted on the spindle in her hand, from which, when it is put into the loom, she will draw the threads for weaving her cloth.

But while thus bent on money-making, even at the cost of necessary sleep, she has a far better side; for she has kept her heart tender. It appears, indeed, that her motive in all her wonderful industry, and in her liking for gain, is not a selfish one, but the yearning desire to benefit others. "She stretcheth out her hand to the poor, yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy." The same loving thoughtfulness and devotion are seen in her care of her household. On the Jewish hills, winter storms of driving snow are not infrequent. Indeed, a friend lately told me how he had lost his way, trying to get to the gates of Jerusalem from where the vehicle in which he had been riding towards the city had been stopped by snow, before he came in sight of the walls. The drift had completely obliterated all traces of the road. But if such fierce weather broke over the home of the poet's ideal wife, she needed have no concern; for her motherly forethought had provided her whole household with thickly lined garments of warm scarlet cloth, so that they were at once defended from the cold and notable for the fine show of their outfit. Everything, moreover, in her home, is in keeping with this. There is as little to fear from the cold by night as by day, for she makes coverlets, warm and beautiful, for the beds. As to herself, she has the finest, most lovely clothing of snowy linen and costly cloth, dyed with the Tyrian purple.

Through such a wife her husband grows in honor, and sits among the shaykhs of the land when they sit in council to settle disputes or transact town affairs in the public gathering-place, outside the gates. No wonder her family is so favorably known, for her cleverness is seen on all sides. She makes up, besides spinning the cloth for them, night-dresses, curtains, cloth for samplers, body-linen of all kinds, but especially the smock frocks or blouses, worn by the mass of the people in the hot weather, of linen. For all this is given in the Talmud as included in the Hebrew word used. She makes costly girdles, also, and sells them to the Phœnician trader, from whom she gets her Tyrian dye.

Commanding ability and a dignified bearing sit on her like a robe; and she laughs at the time to come, knowing she is well prepared to meet it. But she is good as well as able. She opens her mouth with wisdom, and loving counsel is in her words. She takes good heed how things go on in her house, seeing that all goes right in its daily life and daily provision, and assuredly does not eat the bread of idleness. No wonder that her sons, as they grow up, call her "blessed," or that her husband praises her, declaring that, though "many daughters of Israel may have shown high qualities, she had excelled them all."

Now comes the moral by the poet. "Womanly charms deceive, and beauty is only a breath; but men will praise a woman that fears Jehovah. Take care that she enjoys her full share of the blessings she creates, and let her works themselves speak for her, before all, in the gates."—S. S. Times.

How Lincoln Educated Himself.

"Did you not have a law education?"

"Oh, yes! I 'read law,' as the phrase is; that is, I became a lawyer's clerk in Springfield, and copied tedious documents, and picked up what I could of law in the intervals of other work. But your question reminds me of a bit of education I had which I am bound in honesty to mention. In the course of my law reading I constantly came upon the word 'demonstrate.' I thought at first that I understood its meaning, but soon became satisfied I did not. I said to myself, What do I do when I demonstrate more than when I reason or prove? How does demonstration differ from any other proof?' I consulted Webster's Dictionary. That told of 'certain proof,' proof beyond the possibility of doubt; but I could form no idea of what sort of proof that was. I thought a great many things were proved beyond the possibility of doubt without resource to any such extraordinary process of reasoning as I understood 'demonstration' to be. I consulted all the dictionaries and books of reference I could find, but with no better results. You might as well have defined 'blue' to a blind man. At last I said, 'Lincoln, you can never make a lawyer if you do not not understand what demonstrate means:' and I left my situation in Springfield, went home to my father's house, and stayed there till I could give any proposition in the six books of 'Euclid' at sight, I then found out what 'demonstrate' means, and went back to my law studies."—From "Life of Abraham Lincoln," by C. C. Coffin.

A Blind Girl's Tribute.

The tenderest tribute of love to the memory of Bishop Brooks we have seen, or ever expect to see to the memory of anyone, is the following from Helen Keller, in a letter to a friend published in the "Boston Transcript":

Hellen Keller is a young girl, deaf, dumb, and blind, and the only way of communicating with her is to touch the palm of her hand in ways indicative of words. In the letter referred to she wrote:

"You know I have lost my loving friend, Bishop Brooks. Oh, it is very hard to bear this great sorrow; hard to believe that I shall never more hold his gentle hand while he tells me about God and love and goodness. Oh, his beautiful words! They come back to me with sweet new meaning. He once said to me: 'Helen, dear child,' that is what he always called me, 'we must trust our heavenly father always, and look beyond our present pain and disappointment with a hopeful smile.' And in the midst of my sorrow I seem to hear his glad voice say: 'Helen, you SHALL see me again in that beautiful world we used to talk about in my study. Let not your heart be troubled.' Then heaven seems very near, since a tender, loving friend awaits us there."

NOTES.

The bishops held their meeting at Kansas City, just prior to the meeting of the Board. We publish elsewhere the plan of episcopal visitation for the year 1893-4. Our people will rejoice to see Bishop Fitzgerald, having read and heard so much of him in years gone by. He is thoroughly westernized and is in full sympathy with our work in the Northwest. He had the courage to stand up and talk and write and contend most earnestly for us in years gone by and when nearly all others were against us. We trust that we will show our appreciation of this by the cordial greeting that shall be given him next August.

It was a pleasure to meet Dr. Young G. Allen, of China, and hear him talk of that wonderful empire. We never had such an idea of the vastness of the work of converting that land of darkness before. The doctor is thoroughly posted on his subject, is devoted to his work, and enthusiastic at the prospect of final success.

One of the first men we met in Kansas City was Rev. J. M. Gross, of Oklahoma district, who was there pleading for help for our church at Oklahoma City. It was a great joy to know that he had escaped the ravages of the cyclones.

Dr. David Morton, Secretary of our Church Extension Board, was in attendance at the session of the Board of Missions, and by request addressed the Board upon some features of our work in Colorado and New Mexico. He had recently made a trip to that region. He was looking hale and hearty as ever.

All the bishops except J. C. Granbery were present at the meeting of the Board. Bishop Granbery has been quite ill, and was unable to be present. Bishop Fitzgerald was prostrated on Sunday and unable to preach, while Bishop Wilson was not in vigorous health. Bishop Keener, though showing the marks of age, is vigorous in mind and body for one of his years, and takes an active interest in all the affairs of the Church. All the rest of the college appeared strong and ready for the work before them.

We sympathize most deeply with Bishop Haygood, and our brethren in California in their disappointment last year and this, at not getting needed help from the Board to relieve pressing wants. We know how it is, for we have been in the same fix for twenty years, and have had to live on as short rations as any of them—and doing our own cooking too—not for one or two years, but for many, and when we could have done much better in other fields, if we had so elected. We say this in no spirit of boasting, but only to encourage our brethren to be patient and hold on a little longer. A better day is coming by and by.

Either in mercy to us or to the congregations about the great metropolis, we had no appointment on Sunday, and greatly enjoyed a splendid sermon in the morning, from good Bishop Key and one at night from Dr. Hoss, Editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate—both at Walnut street. We were sorry that we could not accept the pressing invitations from Brother James Smith, of Melton, and Brother J. R. A. Vaugn, of Brunswick, to fill their pulpits, but it was impossible for us to do so.

On Monday morning, May 8th, the bishops and quite a number of the members of the Board were treated, by the Commercial Club of Kansas City, to a drive through the principal streets and to the principal objects of interest in the city, including a visit to and through the great Armour packing house. Some said the object was to show the bishops to Kansas City; others, that it was to show Kansas City to the bishops. Well, be that as it may, we think the bishops were pleased, as were some of the "other clergy," with all except with the offensive odor that pervades all that region of the city where the packing house is located. We were introduced to the proprietor, Mr. Armour, who is a plain-looking, pleasant-faced gentleman. We saw where animals are driven into a chute, as squealing swine and come out sausage at the other end. In one place they go in fat steers and emerge in the shape of choice beef or butterine, just as you prefer to see. And the process of transformation is exceedingly short. The institution is capable of butchering and taking care of 4,000 cattle and 10,000 hogs a day. There are a number of other establishments of the same kind located along the Kaw river in Kansas City.

Our host and hostess during our stay in Kansas City were Dr. R. J. Pearson and wife. Sister Pearson is the daughter of Rev. John Harrell, formerly of the Indian Mission Conference. Dr. Pearson is the publisher of the Western Dental Journal. Our room-mate was Rev. S. T. Mallory, of the West Virginia Conference, who is a devoted, sweet-spirited Christian man. With such company we could not but be greatly refreshed. We were also made welcome as a visitor at the home of Judge E. L. Scarritt, where we had the great pleasure of meeting our old friend, Dr. Morris, who practised medicine in Helena for several years, and his mother, Mrs. M. J. Morris, who reads and enjoys the Montana Methodist. Judge Scarritt is the son of the lamented Rev. Nathan Scarritt. Though but little the rise of thirty, he has been elected judge of the court in his county. He is very plain and unassuming, but unusually gifted and very popular. What a satisfaction to see such men devoted to the church of God. After all, what would the world do without preachers' sons? Would there were more such!

The editor left Kansas City on Monday evening, May 8th, for a brief visit to Chicago when these lines are scribbled in haste. There are many things which we have in mind to say, but time and space forbid their mention in this issue, except that the exhibits at the World's Fair are far from complete. Many of the buildings are full of boxes and confusion reigns. There is no trouble about getting rooms or board in the city at reasonable rates, or about getting to and from the grounds when you once learn the way. We would advise our friends who think of coming to see the sights to postpone their visit for at least a month or six weeks. It will be that long or longer before things are in shape.

FIELD NOTES.

Dear Methodist:— Your coming is a source of joy in our home: for while we take several members of the Advocate family, yet this one devoted to the work and workers on our own field seems a little the nearest to our hearts.

I sincerely hope it may prosper, and succeed so well that it may never waver nor cease to wave till all this land shall know the Christ it holds up. The District Conference number is the best one of the year in my judgment, and I may here whisper that the Editor preached one of the best sermons of the whole occasion—one facetiously remarked that "he runs fastest when suddenly jumped up."

It rests a man to be in some other relation for awhile than the "beloved P. E." This scribe spent the Sunday following the Conference at Butte City, "my first love," in Montana. On Saturday evening I called at Barret's, Baldwin's, Mallin's, and Thompson's, and Sister Belcher's and Steiss', and Kemper's and McCall's, and got around to Bro. John Cook's in time for supper with the P. C. who had "cut across the town" and intersected me at that point. Because of some sore throat, I had Brother Alton preach for me Sunday night—had a good day and good communion service.

The Quarterly Conference Monday morning was well attended and the board seemed determined to bring up the considerable deficit which has gathered on the claims upon this charge. Butte must be "full."

The Sabbath at Boulder was a pleasant one with good communion service at night. Our good sister Clarke had been poorly with la Grippe for some time, but was able to attend all the Sunday services. Why are not the wives of our missionaries in this West numbered with the workers on this field, receiving eulogy for their faithfulness while living and a memoir at the annual conference session when they depart from us? I preached at Alhambra on Monday night to a full house of most attentive hearers. "Grandma" Stine had been very sick, but was convalescing at that time and I hope is now quite well. How many a tired and hungry itinerant has tried the hospitality of this good home? "Ye shall receive a hundred fold more in this present world, of houses and lands, and father's and mother's" etc. Through the excellent spirit of our good Brother Shaeffer, I was permitted to spend the Sunday allotted to Helena at Elliston and Garrison, two points hitherto unoccupied by us—a "destitute field," as our Baptist brethren would say. I found an "open door" at Elliston— a funeral at which the family gladly received my ministrations, and the whole community welcomed the Sunday school which I proposed to organize, and the appointment to preach which I left with them.

There are perhaps 300 or 400 people thereabouts with no gospel; but 11 out of the 13 business houses have a drink department, so they say. Here is a call for our Methodism.

In the evening I preached at Garrison, where our brethren, Glasgow and McLaughlin, had been holding meetings for a week.

An excellent school-house well filled with intelligent people met us here and received the word with gladness—two men stood for prayers. At my suggestion a collection was taken for the preacher in charge, amounting to $6.65.

A good Sunday school is running at this place for several weeks now and the prospect is encouraging for a good circuit, embracing these points in connection with Avon and Drummond.

I found Bro. Bramble much distressed because his new parsonage was not ready for him by his 3rd quarterly conference, but it will soon be done, and will be one of the best in the conference.

A telegram reached me at East Helena announcing the death, by asphyxiation, of George B. Hensley, and I hurried home to preach the funeral—his father was buried from the same church, the 4th of Jan., 1893.

The preachers are all well and hard at work. I trust that several good meetings will yet be held between this and conference—Methodism must have revivals continually. I hereby most earnestly exhort all the preachers to secure their collections at once and let the Domestic Mission collection be sent in to Bro. A. G. Clarke, Treasurer, or to myself as the P. E. Let us make the very most of the few remaining months of the conference year, for you see we are nearing the end by the following announcements for the Fourth Round.

FROM THE SUNNY SOUTH.

My Dear Methodist:—

As I formerly gave you an account of each of our Quarterly Conferences, we feel like keeping up the custom, even now. Well, the Second Quarterly Conference for this current year, and first since we took charge of the work, was held April 21, 1893, J. B. Campbell, P. E., in the chair.

There have been no accessions or infant baptisms; but the dear Lord has been "shaking the dry bones of the valley" in Israel, Praise His Name! At one of our churches, recently, the altar was crowded, and a wonderful baptism swept down over preacher and people.

We are pressing the battle to the gates on the line of Missions. The Western field receives special attention, and we urge its great needs on the people both in pulpit and at fireside.

About $90.00 have been raised during the present quarter for Missions, in cash and reliable subscriptions; $111.00 for the support of the ministry and $8.00 on the "Mission Debt." We thank God and take courage, and trust to have greater manifestations in the future of divine power. The people have been exceedingly kind to us, and we have had abundance of the necessaries of life sent in to us.

Our Presiding Elder is a strong man, a Boanerges in the pulpit, a St. John at the fireside. He presses home upon the consciences of the official members their duty to their Church and to their God.

All nature is laughing down here. Over woodland, hill and dale, the sweet aroma of varied flowers is wafted by gentle zephyrs and up above and around us the silent anthems roll making you leap amid the forests from pure joy in living. More anon. Love to all. As ever, world fears that it will ultimately be paid out at an advance of something like 30 per cent. Creditors, private and public, fearing that they will be thus "jockeyed" are calling for gold while they can get it. Cleveland has just said to them, "You shall have the gold dollar, don't be scared;" and the result is that less gold is demanded for export and more is offered to the treasury by the banks.

Fred St. Clair.

A KINDERGARTEN illustration in finance. A Texan cowboy near the Mexican line tenders a U. S. silver dollar for a drink, the seller having no change hands out a Mexican dollar which is below par by the amount charged for the liquor. This dollar is subsequently tendered by our bibulous example for a Mexican drink and a U. S. dollar is given him in exchange, the discount of such a dollar on this side of the line being also equal to the value of the liquid consumed. Thus by simply stepping back and forth across the line the thirsty soul can drink as often as he pleases and still keep his dollar. Who pays for the drinks?

CHOLERA CULTURE.. The Government scientists are propagating cholera bacilli by the billion. The germs were imported several years ago and recently others have been procured from immigrants. They are planted in a mixture of beef peptone and gelatine. The bacilli thus propagated when magnified a thousand times appear pinkish comma-shaped worms of the size of a pin point. Taken into a healthy stomach they are harmless, but not if the stomach or alimentary canal be weakened by excessive eating, drinking or other cause. In experimenting upon guinea pigs and rabbits it is necessary to disturb their healthy digestion by artificial means and render them liable to cholera. It is claimed that a method of vaccination against cholera has been discovered by these experiments. It has been learned that the bacilli can not endure acids, extremes of heat, cold nor drought. A bacillus dry enough to be wafted in the air is dead and harmless. In cholera times we should eat and drink things fresh from the fire and keep coin, paper, car tickets, postage stamps, pencils, penholders, gloves, rings, fingers and everything else of the kind out of the mouth. The propagation of fatal diseases such as cholera, consumption, typhus, scarlet and yellow fevers, diphtheria, and the like, by living germs is a subject which should be popularly understood and the deadly microscopic germs of every variety should be quarantined, frozen, boiled, baked, fumigated, and banished from civilized lands.

There is an enduring tenderness in the love of a mother to a son that transcends all other affections of the heart. It is neither to be chilled by selfishness, nor daunted by danger, nor weakened by worthlessness, nor stifled by ingratitude. She will sacrifice every comfort to his convenience; she will surrender every pleasure to his enjoyment; will glory in his fame and exult in his prosperity; and if adversity overtakes him he will be the dearer to her by misfortune; and if disgrace settle upon his name she will still love and cherish him; and if all the world besides cast him off she will be all the world to him.—Washington Irving.

EDITORIAL.

A RECOLLECTION.

Our recent trip to Kansas City calls up the memory of a former one. It was in the fall of 1867, when the session of the St. Louis Conference was held there. We rode all the way from our home on Big Stranger creek, a dozen miles west of Leavenworth City, in Kansas, on horseback, making a journey of forty miles in less than a day, crossing the Kaw river at Wyandotte on a rope ferry, just at sundown. We arrived in the city, hitched our jaded horse to a post, and made our way up the stilted sidewalk to the old brick church, which by the recent grading had been left many feet above the level of the street. We were worn and sick from our long ride, but soon forgot our weariness in the company that surrounded us. The congregation was just gathering for the Saturday night missionary meeting. The group gathered about the door, addressed each other by such names as Finney, Pinkard, Prattsman —all titles being omitted—, and with a familiarity that seemed like sacrilege to us. We could hardly believe that we were actually in the presence of men whose names, from reading them in the "St. Louis Advocate," we had come to regard with reverence. We went inside, and on the platform sat A. L. P. Green, J. B. McFerrin, Dr. Lebon, and Bishop Marvin, the unselfish and saintly expression of the latter winning us at first sight and getting a hold on our affections that grows stronger and stronger as the years roll on. We had never seen such an assembly of Methodists, particularly Southern Methodists, before, and to be in such company and to listen to such leaders was simply overwhelming to an uncultured country boy.

Each speaker seemed to be in his best mood. Marvin pleaded with pathos for suffering missionaries in Indian Territory, to whom he had given a personal pledge of $5,000. Green, the treasurer, with wit and wisdom and wonderful descriptive power dwelt upon the destitution of the South which had once given so liberally to missions, but now appealed for help. Lebon, with fine portly form and dignified mien, discoursed upon Foreign Missions, and McFerrin, in his own unique and humorous manner, took up the collection. Lebon began as though he was going to take the collection and asked if there was not some one there who would give fifty dollars for missions. While he paused, apparently for a response, McFerrin who could keep his seat no longer stepped out with his cane hanging on his arm, hobbled to the front of the platform, and as if indignant because the doctor had started the amount at so low a figure, shouted "Yes, there are men here who are going to give us a hundred dollars for missions to-night." At this some generous spirit responded: "I'll give you two hundred dollars." McFerrin, with an air of triumph then turned and ridiculed Dr. Lebon in his humorous way, for having asked these Kansas City city people for so small an amount. The collection amounted to $1,700. It was simply wonderful.

The next day we got out of a sick bed and made our way to hear Bishop Marvin preach a soul-stirring sermon on, "He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied." Dr. Lewis was pastor then. The next morning (Monday) we were in the conference room (for the first time in our life) until noon. W. W. Prattsman was secretary. W. A. Smith was a member, and was there. Photographs of the martyred Headley hung on the wall, and the spirit of the martyrs thrilled the hearts of the consecrated men as they gave in reports which revealed trials and conflicts sore, but also successes that thrilled and nerved for greater battles and grander conquests. The impressions of that visit have never been effaced.

Kansas City was a small town, comparatively—we walked to the home assigned us in the suburbs. Surely we never dreamed that one day we would be favored by the officials with a ride, such as was recently tendered to members of the Board of Missions, in elegant turnouts, through the streets and to the institutions of a great city of 150,000 people—over 200,000, counting Kansas City Kansas, and it is virtually one city. Methodism then numbered only one church and a poor one at that, with a few hundred members, while now we have eight churches with, say, 1,500 members, beside the Scarritt Training school, while the M. E. Church, North, perhaps numbers as many more. With the great railroad and manufacturing center possessed by Kansas City and the growth that Methodism has made in the past, and with the facilities it now possesses for successful work, what developments may we not expect during the quarter of a century next to come! May the Lord help our preachers and people to keep abreast of the times, keep a strong hold on the hearts of the masses of the people and make use of every opportunity to glorify Him and advance His cause.

WAYSIDE PENCILINGS.

Bishop Haygood is the first man who has inaugurated and carried out any vigorous and extended "special" movement to supply our western work with much needed reinforcements, and the Board of Missions refused to grant the small amount asked to help provide for them. We believe it was a great mistake, but we think it will not repeat its action in that respect.

The brethren who voted against the resolution that proposed increasing the appropriation to the West by $10,000 above what the committee on estimates had recommended did so because they could not endure to see the salaries of men in the foreign fields is scaled in the least, or see the quoto of laborers cut down. We cannot think their sympathy altogether wisely directed. Our men who are standing in the fore front of the battle on the Western frontier have equal claims upon the church with those who happen to be just outside the boundaries of the United States. They are sent out by the same high authority, have the same right to a subsistance, and yet many of them, we believe, are in far greater need of the necessaries of life than any in foreign lands. It is deplorable that men in charge of responsible positions are compelled to live as we know many of our brethren on the border do live. The time is at hand when there must be a change in the proportionate distribution of these funds, and we think it might as well come now as at any time. Hence, we voted for the resolution. Ten thousand dollars taken from two hundred and twenty-five thousand would hardly be a drop in the bucket—would hardly be missed—while it would bring "showers of blessing" and carry great refreshing and rejoicing to the hearts and homes of scores of our Western workers, and it ought to have been granted.

These notes are written on board the train going from Kansas City to Denver, on the Union Pacific line. We have just caught sight of the mountains, the grand old Rockies, looming up in the distance toward the setting sun. The sight is refreshing, as is the cooling breeze that comes down from their snowy heights to relieve the atmosphere of its sultriness, from which we have suffered much during the last twenty-four hours. We have been away scarcely a week, but the sight of the mountains always makes us glad, whether our absence has been long or short. Standing up in such majesty and grandeur, snow covered, azure-hued, their shivering summits reaching to the sky, who can behold them and not feel the thrill of a fresh inspiration in his soul? To us they bring pleasing thoughts of a little home, the most delightul place, to us, on earth, and loved ones, and of a field where we have long felt the Master has called us to labor. If such earthly scenes along the journey of life so inspire and cheer us, we sometimes wonder what it will be as we shall reach the end of the journey, and from the summit of the last hill-top the view of the delectable mountains, the city of our God where is the home of the soul, and the loved ones of earth are waiting, first bursts upon our enraptured vision. Surely

"The glorious sight will gladden
Each weary wandering eye,
In the crowning day that's coming,
By and by."

When the West Virginia Conference was called at the meeting of the Board of Missions, as was the custom, Bishop Keener, who was in charge there, arose to represent the work. He had taken little part in the lively discussion the previous day on the western work, and it was now his time to talk. He made a splendid talk on selfishness and the love of ease, and the greed for gain that prevails in the church. Some of the pictures that he drew, of large and wealthy congregations worshiping in costly churches with cushioned pews and paying from $1,500 to $2,500 a year for fine music alone, while the heathens were perishing, were vivid, indeed. He made a fine speech for Foreign Missions, but was notably silent concerning the claims of the work in West Virginia, on the Board of Missions.

——

Bishop Fitzgerald is the soul of brotherly love and good humor, and is ready with the right word for almost any emergency. The happy manner in which he referred to Bishop Duncan's "post-mortem speech for the West," which was reserved until after he had voted against the measure proposed for the relief of the West, and also of the "logical twist" by which he endeavored to explain why he voted on one side and then spoke on the other, brought down the house.

——

Dr. J. O. Branch startled some of his hearers by asserting before the Board of Missions that the conversion of the West meant more for the salvation of the world, than the conversion of the whole Chinese Empire. Good Bishop Keener was fairly taken off his feet by it. But the Doctor was confident that the conversion of the West to God meant in the end the conversion of the world. It was just as if he had said the conversion of St. Paul was of more importance in the salvation of the world than that of Asia Minor, for it involved not only the conversion of Asia Minor, but other lands be side.

——

The irony of Bishop Wilson was most telling as he showed how the Board had bound itself by an iron rule so that it could not respond to the cry of distress and the calls for help that came up from the Pacific coast. He believed in granting the needed help if it bankrupted the whole church to do it. He was right. If the church cannot take care of its faithful workmen it had better cease operations.

——

Rev. B. F. Haynes, the enterprising editor of the Tennessee Methodist, was on hand at Kansas City, mingling with the brethren and taking notes for his paper, which contains the fullest account of the proceedings of the Board that we have yet seen in any our church papers.

——

It was a great pleasure to meet with so many of our brethren from the Missouri and Western Conferences at Kansas City. Their smiling faces, pleasant words and hearty handshakes were most refreshing. We note especially the name of Rev. W. M. Prattsman, of Jefferson City, whom we had not seen since we first met him at Kansas City in September 1867, when he was secretary of the conference. Though he is almost blind, owing to paralysis of the optic nerve, yet his general health is good, his mind vigorous, spirit cheerful, his faith strong, and he wields the pen with much the same power as in his younger days. He is an ardent friend of the West, and has promised to write for the "Methodist." Our readers may look out for a treat.

——

The Scarritt Bible and Training School, which was in process of erection when we were last at Kansas City, is now completed and in running order, with a full faculty and about fifteen students. The building occupies a commanding view, standing on a high bluff in east Kansas City, on the south side of the "Big Muddy." It shows to good advantage from the railroad approaches north of the river. We were introduced to Miss Maria Gibson, the principal, who is an accomplished lady, and to other officers who seemed to take pleasure in showing us through the building. The hospital already pays the expense of that department. We pray that we may not be overtaken with sickness away from home, but if so, it would surely be a satisfaction to receive the attention that is here given to patients. We prophesy prosperity to this institution.

——

Under the title of "Love Licks," Dr. Hoss, of the Nashville Christian Advocate, in a good natured but most vigorous manner takes Dr. Arthur Edwards, of the North Western Advocate to task for wholesale insinuations against the press and people of the South, when speaking of certain cases of moblaw that have occurred on that side of the line. When will our brethren learn to deal justly with their fellowmen? They will publish column after column concerning southern horrors and dismiss a lawless hanging of a negro in Kansas, where there was not one tenth the provocation—no outraged innocence and purity, no murdered child, as in Texas—that there has been in the southern states, with a simple note of only seventeen lives. People ought to sweep well around their own door-yards before dealing in such wholesale denounciation of their neighbors. If the people of the higher latitudes had the race problems to deal with for just one year, as it exists in Arkansas or Alabama, we doubt not they would be wiser and sadder and would wonder how their brethren in Dixie had succeeded half so well. The Lord give us the spirit of love and of a sound mind and help us to denounce sin and defend virtue regardless of the longitude or latitude where it is found.

——

The St. Louis Advocate devotes its issue of May 3rd to a review of our missionary work. It is a very creditable number.

——

The Evangel is the appropriate title of a modest but attractive little sheet of 8 pages, the organ of Scarritt Bible and Training School. Miss Elizabeth Holding is the editor. The subscription price is twenty-five cents.

——

Our readers and correspondents will understand that for three weeks past we have been absent from our office, without access to our exchanges, and when we could not give personal attention to correspondence. This note is written just as we are crossing the main range of the Rockies between Larimie City and Green River.

——

We shall (D. V.) be at Ogden, Utah, to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, when our "copy" will be mailed to the printer. The next day we expect to be "at home once more," when we shall make haste to give due attention to all matters pertaining to the paper.

——

We appreciated the cordial and pressing invitation given us by Bishop Hargrove and Dr. Finney to attend a meeting at St. Louis, to be held in the interest of the Woman's Department of Church Extension and Home Mission work. We hoped to attend, but found that other arrangements would not permit. We are in sympathy with this work, and are ready to do all in our power to help carry it forward.

——

While in Kansas City, just as we were starting homeward we had the exquisite pleasure of meeting with Brothers Payton Smith, T. D. Woodson, and Rev. —Godbey, who were on their way from District Conference to their home at and near Richmond, Mo. Evidently they had enjoyed the Conference.

REVERENCE AND FIDELITY.

LESSON TEXT.—Eccl. 5:1-12.

ILLUSTRATIVE APPLICATIONS.

By H. Clay Trumbull.

Keep thy foot when thou goes to the house of God." (v. 1.) The foot is an index of the character. In a peculiar sense the foot stands for the personality. It is not enough to have a thought of the lips, and of the eyes, and of the ears, when coming into the presence of God; but the bearing of the whole man, as represented in the foot, is to be considered thoughtfully at such a time. The foot decides the attitude and the movement of the man. It settles "the walk and the conversation." It reveals the posture of the man in view of the presence he is entering. The late comer into the sanctuary services discloses by his step his offensive self-consciousness or his quiet deference to authority, his reverence or his lack of it. If you realize that God is holy, and that his house represents his holiness, you will keep your foot when you enter his house. You cannot show a right spirit as a worshiper by the expression of your face unless you evidence it also in your foot.

"Let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God; for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few" [v. 2.] As a rule, the less a man knows the readier he is to talk about it. Not until a man knows more than the average man, does he come to realize how little he does know. It has been said that a man's thoughts are like water in a bottle, "the less there is in it the more noise it makes coming out." When he is in the presence of a superior in wisdom, the wiser a man is the less he is disposed to venture the expression of his opinion, and the more desirous he is of learning the views of his superior. But when a man comes before God he is humbled, and he keeps silence, as one who is unworthy to be heard, just in proportion as he has a right spirit and a true sense of his fitting posture in God's sight. It is "a fool's voice" that sounds out in "a multitude of words" when speaking to or for God.

"Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay" [v. 5]. A vow is a solemn and a sacred thing. It is well to vow in God's cause and at God's leading, when one has a right to vow,—to vow fidelity to God, to vow to be loyal as a Christian, as a patriot, as a husband, as a friend. But it is not well to look upon a vow reverently made before God as open to change or bandonment. If the vow was a vow that one had a right to make when it was made, it ought not to be held lightly, or looked at as open to reversal or revision. It should be adhered to as a covenant with God himself, in whose presence it was spoken. It is for now as for always, and for always as now. The making of a vow is a serious matter, and the being true to it is not less so.

"If thou seest the oppression of the poor, . . . marvel not at the matter: for one higher than the high regardeth it." [v. 8]. We have no need to trouble ourselves over those mysteries of providence which are beyond our control or responsibility. We ought to see to it that we do not oppress the poor or pervert justice, and that our example and influence are in favor of the right, and of fair dealing with all. But when it is clear that God permits others to do wrong, it is our duty to fall back on the fact that God knows what he is doing, and what he is permitting, and why. What he does we known not now, but we shall know hereafter. We walk by faith, not by sight, as to God's plans and methods of work.

"He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase"(v.10). Wealth as a means of good may prove a blessing; but wealth sought as an end is a course rather than a blessing. He who lives for money-getting is cut off, by his very purpose of life, from enjoyment in life. The more money he has, the more he wants; and his desire for more increases with his accumulations. Generally speaking, the rich have less of gain from money than the poor. The rich enjoy getting more than they enjoy wise spending; but they who think of money only for its wise spending, enjoy delights unknown to the wealthy. It is much the same in every sphere of life. In eating and drinking, in pleasure-seeking, in striving for honor or fame, in the pursuit of knowledge, in spiritual aspirations, he who makes the special object of his endeavors an end, can never have the blessedness that comes with the purpose of making it a means to God's glory and to man's welfare.

"The sleep of a laboring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much: but the fullness of the rich will not suffer him to sleep."(v.12). It is a good thing for a man to have to work, whether he wants to or not It is a bad thing for a man to be free to work or not, as he feels like it. The best achievements in this world are wrought by men who must work in order to live. If a man has money enough to live without work he would do well to bind himself to some specified work which must be done in a specified time, and then to stick at that work as a contract duty, or as a vow that must be performed. As to the matter of health, more persons gain through having to work when they feel unable to do so, than suffer because they must work when they would like to rest. Bankruptcy has restored the physical tone and given renewed health to many a man whose fulness was depriving him of sleep, and was causing him to feel that he was unable to do the duty of an able-bodied man.

The Massachusatts Sunday Protective League.—An Appeal for a More Intelligent and Humane Use of the Lord's Day.

Attention is called to the following appeal made not long since through the efforts of Rev. Reuen Thomas, D. D., Vice President of the League, as specially appropriate to the hour.

To Members of Christian Churches in Massachusetts: We, the undersigned, Ministers of the Churches of Christ in the State of Massachusetts, painfully impressed with the many signs in our cities and towns of a steady tendency in the direction of degrading the Lord's Day, affectionately appeal to disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ to recognize the necessity of an intelligent and humane use of an institution from which so much of blessing has come to the homes and churches of our State. We find evidence of the existence of a Seventh Day of rest all through the Scripture History. We find it incorporated into the laws of morals by the greatest of legislators the world has ever known. Our Lord declared himself to be Lord of the Sabbath. The question how best to christianize our weekly rest-day ought to present itself to all his disciples as one of great present importance. The Apostle Paul warns us against so using our Christian liberty that it shall be an occasion of stumbling to those who are weak. No Legislature can christianize our weekly day of rest. It can only give us a labor-free day.

Our Lord's Day rest is endangered from two sources. The mere money-maker wants it for gain; and the pleasure-seeker for dissipation. Against these we have to guard it. The power of corporate wealth is ever increasing. When multitudes of men in the employ of others are asking for shorter hours of labor, and the severity of competition is making such an excessive drain on the nervous energy of men engaged in every kind of mercantile life, is there not a very urgent demand made by Divine Providence upon all our Christian people to elevate the Sunday into a true Lord's Day by making it specially and emphatically a day for home and the church, in which we "honor" the Lord of the Sabbath? "not doing our own ways, nor finding our own pleasure," but "delighting ourselves in the Lord." The forces of greed and lust in our modern life are so subtile and persistent that an institution, which in the name of God says to them "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther," must have in it that moral obligation to which every Christian heart immediately responds. A Great Work.

It is a great work to lead souls to Christ; but it is no greater than to care for them after they have been accepted of him.

How hard we labor, how almost incessantly we pray for the conversion of sinners! Yet how indifferent we often are toward young Christians struggling with temptations! How austere in our judgment of him who, in an unwanton hour, has yielded to sin and fallen! Christ reaches down his gentle hand and bids the Davids and Peters rise, and gladly accepts and blesses them more abundantly than before, if they call on him in a contrite spirit. Let us, too, sympathize with, pray for, and kindly advise these babes in Christ in their first efforts to walk the straight and narrow way, and we shall be doing a great work.

Feeding and Washing.

There is a little girl with us at home just now; and she very much reminds me of not a few of God's children. She is always glad and happy at meal-time, but not at all satisfied at washing-time. She does not like to be washed. This is just the case with many of the Lord's people. They are so glad to be fed—to listen to some comforting and building-up addresses; but they are not all satisfied when God's word is brought to bear on their ways in the way of washing them from everything not in accordance with that word. But the washing is as needful as the feeding. Indeed, if we will not allow God's word to wash us, we need not expect that He will feed us.

Editorial.

On our return from Kansas City we stopped over Sunday again at Denver and worshiped at Morris Memorial where we were pressed by Brother Needham, who was in charge for the morning in the absence of Brother Sherwood, the pastor, to occupy the pulpit. It was a pleasant service. We dined with Brother McClure. A worthy superannuated preacher, and his wife at their cozy home near by. An hour or two was spent most delightfully with them. In the afternoon we went with Needham to his Mission-school which is prosperous and promising. Brother W. R. Wilson is a wide awake superintendent and is greatly interested in his work. He and his accomplished wife are a host in Christian song. The after service was a time of refreshing. The Spirit of the Lord was there. Needham's voice was almost gone, for the time, but his soul was on fire. There is surely a prospect or a fine work here.

Brother Needham had just returned from District Conference at Trinidad, and reported a good time. We were sorry to find Brother Sherwood in poor health.

——

It might be considered vain in us were we to repeat in these columns all the good words we have heard spoken concerning the "Montana Methodist," and the names of those who uttered them. Anyhow, they assure us that the paper is exerting a wider and greater influence for good than many are aware of. Will not our friends unite with us, in a more earnest effort, to extend its circulation and increase is efficiency? Let us have at least two hundred renewals and new subscribers, with one dollar each, by the first of July. Our printers will be after us for money then, and we must be ready for them. Please don't wait for a statement to be sent.

——

The Board of Church Extension of the M. E. Church, South, recently held its session in Louisville, Ky. We publish elsewhere an abstract of the secretary's report, showing the work of this board the past year. We trust that our readers will study it carefully that they may see what a great work is being accomplished, and be encouraged to double their contributions to it next year. Let every preacher in the Northwest see to it that every dollar of the assessment on his charge for Church Extension is raised.

——

The preparation for the matter for this paper commenced soon after we left Kansas City, Mo., and continued at intervals during our journey across the plains and over the Rocky Mountains. Our train was just rolled into Ogden, and this paragraph is penned in the heart of Mormondom. The sky is cloudless, the orchards are in full bloom, the prairies are covered with flowers and verdure, while the mountains are capped with snow. "Every prospect pleases, and only man is vile." We drop this in the mail box at the great depot, and continue on our journey to the Northwest.

WORK.

The General and Conference Boards helped this year 431 Churches, paying them 85,276.10.

The General and Conference Boards helped last year 427 Churches, paying them $87,089.46

Showing an increase of 4 churches and decreased payments $1,813.36.

The General Board was ready to pay $4,700.00 to 3 other churches, but was prevented from doing so by the failure of these Churches to return mortgages sent them for execution. Had these been returned we would have reported an increase of 7 Churches helped and increased payments of $2,886.64. Besides this we could have paid $900.00 to 4 other Churches, but were notified that they were not ready to receive the money.

OUT OF DEBT.

The Board has also paid all its expenses of every kind to this date, and is literally free of debt.

PARSONAGES.

The Ladies' work will show a gratifying increase of which they will make a full report.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

——

BY REV. E. M. BOUNDS, D. D., ASSISTANT EDITOR "NASHVILLE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE."

The character and circulation of the newspapers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, must be a matter of concern to every true Methodist. The character of the newspaper reflects and forms the character of the people. The extent to which the religious newspapers is circulated determines not only the limit of its usefulness but shadows forth the intelligence and wide-awake piety of the people. The newspaper makes the people, the people make the newspaper, they mutually react. While the preaching of God's Word is first and must be kept first in a way which forbids substitutes or rivals, yet the power and efficiency of the newspaper as a secondary agency must be fully accepted and utilized. Wise religious leaders have always availed themselves of the press as a most potent instrument to advocate religious movements. Ours is eminently the newspaper age. The newspaper is the mirror and handmaid of our civilization.

The two cardinal features of the newspaper are the circulation and the character; these involve the maximum or minimum of good. A perfect paper, formed after the highest model with a small circulation, is doomed to a small amount of good. A paper of low order without convictions or force, though its circulation may be great, will be as a notch on a stick as far as the reign of righteousness is concerned; great opportunities make neither great men nor great newspapers.

The high-water mark to be reached in the circulation of our Church-papers is to put a Methodist paper in every Methodist family. This point is not Utopian. It is the ideal which might and ought to be reduced to the practical. Doubtless there are some Methodist preachers laborious, painstaking and fully alive to the importance of this arm of service who have demonstrated the feasibility of this purpose. As a stimulating motive to this end and as information for practical uses, an exhibit of what we have done and what remains to be done, will serve, I think, a good purpose. In figures I will mainly use round numbers. In addition to its Connectional organ, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has twenty Conference organs, six of these are not only the organs but the property of their respective Conferences. The other fourteen are owned by individuals or companies, the Conferences controlling by the election of editors and in other ways. The uniter circulation of these Conference organs is 121,000. If to this we add the circulation of the Nashville Advocate and of eight independent semi-official papers, we have a total of 160,000. We have a Church-membership, clerical and lay, of 1,262,858; estimating four persons to the family, and we have 316,714 families. The circulation of our Church-papers being 160,000, we have a little over one-half of our families supplied with our Church-papers. Not one-half when we take into the reckoning that there are doubtless 20,000 of these families who receive two or three copies of the different Church-papers.

I may illustrate the deficiency and need by reference: The "St. Louis Advocate" has the largest circulation of the Conference organs. After long years of a most remarkable history, with an editor unrivaled in editorial sagacity and popularity, there are still 6,000 Methodist families, by this reckoning, in the Conferences of which it is the organ, who do not take it, and this 6,000 will be doubled when we know that more than 6,000 of its subscribers are drawn from beyond the patronizing Conferences.

The St. Louis Advocate comes near supplying all its homes without doing it. The Arkansas "Methodist and the "Florida Christian Advocate" supply over half of the homes in their territory. Brother DuBose, of San Francisco sends out a circulation which exceeds the Southern Methodist homes on the Pacific-slope. The never tiring, brave Needham, with the Rocky Mountain Methodist, doubles in circulation the number of homes in the Denver territory. The indefatigable and heroic Stanley, with the "Montana Methodist," has enlarged his subscription to 1,000, while his territory has only 150 Southern Methodist homes. It is not a good showing that our Connectional organ at Nashville does not go into more than one in every fourteen Southern Methodist homes.

Our system in the establishment of newspapers has the local and voluntary plan. The Annual Conferences or individuals have acted as the necessities of the case demanded and established organs for the Church. The Methodist Episcopal Church, backed by a great book concern and great financial ability have located organs under Connectional direction and ownership. We may see how their system secures the grand desideratum, "A Methodist paper in every Methodist home." They have 612,289 Methodist homes. Their general official organs in the English language aggregate a circulation of 157,125, a fraction over one to every four families. If we add to this the papers which have sprung up in various quarters and which they term semi-official or unofficial, we have a circulation of 81,000 additional, which will make about one paper to every three families, allowing a good margin for the large number of their families who take two or more papers.

From the showing of these figures our system operates more efficiently toward solving the problem of a paper in each family than theirs. The history of each of the papers under our system is a history of patient toil, of struggles against difficulties and opposition, of self-denial, of growth, of failure and success, each a monument of wearing effort, of sacrifice, of courage, of pertinacity; but these efforts have been a training school and a powerful and touching appeal for support. Brought into being by a local urgency and by individual effort, these endear and help it. It is born of the locality, comes near the people and is en rapport with them by location and by local editing; men "to the manor born" represent the manor. An endowed paper with its bigness, officiality and independence, makes but a feeble plea for support and lose the charm of nearness, of need and of being one of us. A powerful ecclesiasticism is not a good inspector to locate institutions which must come near the people. It eyes the material outlay and returns too much. It looks more to ecclesiastical prestige and strategy than it does to the greatest good to the greatest number, or to the glory of God.

A LUCKY BLOW.

Here is a story that proves the old saying that "truth is stranger than fiction." The incident happened in the State of Washington, and not very far from Olympia, the capital.

Most boys have read of the cougar, a fierce animal of the same family as the panther. Cougars are not very numerous, fortunately, because they are among the most dangerous of American wild beasts. When full grown they measure from seven to nine feet from "tip to tip", that is, from the tip of the nose to the tip of the tail, and stand about as high as our largest dogs. In color they are a light brown. Though exceedingly fierce, they are also cowardly, and will run away if they are attacked; but they will creep near a man, or a deer or other animals, such as mountain goats, sheep and cattle, and, having sprung suddenly upon them, seize them by the throat with a grip which generally is not loosened until they have sucked the life blood of their prey.

Usually they keep at a distance from the settlements; but sometimes their cry, "Hoo-hoo," which sounds very much like the human voice, can be heard around the edge of the clearings, and on rare occasions they come out of their forest haunts into thickly settled places. One of them, indeed this very year, wandered into the city of Seattle, and was shot, after it had created not a little alarm among pedestrians. One of its performances was an attempt to board an electric car. It is thought that these rovers are beasts that have lost their mates, and in searching for them go at random in every direction.

But to the story.

Two little boys, whose names were Freddie and Tom, set out for school one fine summer morning a little over a year ago. Fred was seven years old, and Tom, who was nearly eleven, felt that his little brother was his especial charge. Their mother had made them up a lunch; for the distance to school was too great to permit them to come home at dinner time. Fred carried the bread and cheese in a little basket, while Tom had a bottle of milk under his arm—a good, large strong bottle.

"Take good care of Freddie, Tom!" said their mother, as she kissed them good-by.

Tom always liked to be told this; and he would straighten back his sturdy shoulders, and hold his curly head a little higher every time it was said to him.

"Yes, mother," he answered.

"Come along, Fred, or we'll be late."

And away the little fellows trudged, while their mother went back into the house, breathing, as she alway did when the boys left home, a brief prayer to Him who

O'er the loving and the gentle gives his holy angels charge."

Between the boys' home and the schoolhouse was a piece of woods where tall maple, ash and cottonwood trees grew, with a dense undergrowth of alder. It was a lonely looking place, especially because the road did not go straight through it, but turned first to one side then to another to avoid trees that had seemed too big to cut. So tall and close together were the trees, that the sun could not find its way through the leaves, and even on the brightest days it was always dark and gloomy. The boys always like to hurry through it, and this morning they quickened their steps as soon as they got within the shadow, taking opposite sides of the wagon track, so as not to be in each other's way.

They had just passed the first turn in the road when a crackling noise was heard in the woods on Freddie's side. Before they had time to speak to each other, a lithe brown form leaped from between two alder bushes, and, alighting in the center of the road, stood facing the boys. They did not know what it was, but seeing it crouch for a spring, Tom ran to get between it and Freddie. There was a deep hole in the road, which he had to go around, and, delayed by this, hi saw the creature spring forward at Freddie, as a cat springs upon a mouse, and, striking the little fellow with one of its powerful paws, bear him to the earth. Poor little Freddie, too much surprised and frightened to cry, lay prostrate, the beast, which was a cougar of the largest size, standing over him, its horrible fangs glistening as it made ready to seize him by the throat.

There was only one thing for Tom to do, and he did it. Seizing his milk bottle by the neck, he swung it above his head and then, as he sprang forward, brought it down with all the strength of which his young arm was capable, between the cougar's eyes. It was a well-aimed blow, and strong enough to smash the bottle into a dozen fragments. The milk ran into the cougar's eyes and down his nose into Freddie's face. Never was a cougar more astonished. Bottles of milk and litt e boys were things it did not know anything about, and it gave a great bound over Freddie's head, as he lay quietly on the ground, and disappeared into the woods.

"Did it hurt you, Freddie?" asked Tom.

'Guess not," was the little fellow's answer, as he rose to his feet.

"Oh, he did, Freddie," exclaimed Tom. There's blood on your coat and the sleeve's all torn."

Fred looked at the place indicated and burst into tears.

"There's blood running down my arm," he cried.

"Let's run home," answered his brother; and taking the little fellow's uninjured arm, he ran along through the mud by his side.

Freddie almost fainted from the loss of blood; but his mother, who saw them coming, knew something must be the matter, and hurried to meet them and without waiting to hear the story, which Tom told as he ran beside her to the house, seized the little boy in her arms and bore him home as fast as her feet could carry her. The doctor, when summoned, found it necessary to put several stiches in Freddie's wound, which the cougar had made by the stroke of its paw; but the little fellow was soon himself again and not a little proud of his scars.

The cougar did not fare so well; for when Tom told his father of the adventure, he called two neighbors to his assistance, and, armed with rifles, they set out for the forest, where, after a few hours' hunt, in which Hero, a splendid black hound, did his share of the work, they came upon the cougar and shot it. The skin was given to Tom, as a reward for his rescue of his brother, and it lies on the floor before the boys' bed in their little attic room. Freddie carries in his pocket one of the claws that made the scars upon his arm.—New York Independent.

An Untruth.

Two young masons were building a brick wall—the front wall of a high house. One of them, in placing a brick, discovered that it was a little thicker on one side than the other. His companion advised him to throw it out. "It will make your wall untrue, Ben," he said.

"Pooh!" answered Ben, "what difference will such a trifle as that make? You are too particular."

"My mother," replied he, "taught me that truth is truth, and even so little an untruth is a lie, and a lie is no trifle."

"Oh!" said Ben, "that's all very well; but I am not lying, and have no intention of lying."

"Very true; but you make your wall tell a lie, and I have read that a lie in one's work is like a lie in his character—it will show itself sooner or later, and bring harm if not ruin."

"I'll risk it in this case," answered Ben, and he worked away, laying more bricks, and carrying the wall up higher till the close of the day, when they quitted work and went home.

The next morning they went to resume their work, when, behold! the lie had wrought out the result of all lies. The wall, getting a little slant from the untrue brick, had got more and more untrue as the wall got higher, and at last, in the night, had toppled over. Just so with ever so little an untruth in your character; it grows more and more untrue, if you permit it to remain, till it brings sorrow and ruin. Tell, act, and live the exact truth always.—Selected.

EDITORIAL.

A PLEA FOR THE WEST.

In a recent issue we referred to the lively discussion and close vote had in the Board of Missions over a motion to increase the proportion of missionary funds appropriated to the Western work. A memorial was presented from the Merced District Conference [California] and one from the Helena District Conference [Montana] for a larger appropriation to these respective fields. The matter was referred to a special committee. The principal discussion was brought out by Bishop Haygood's motion to increase the amount recommended by the committee on estimates to the Pacific Conference $1,000, and the Los Angeles Conference $2,000. "The Kansas City Times" characterized the debate as "a battle of the giants." Some of the best talent of the church was represented on both sides. In all the debate not a word was said against the West, or against the propriety of our occupancy of any portion of the West. The matter was brought to an issue by the presentation of the report of the special committee, which failed of adoption by a vote of 12 for and 13 against. As we desire that our readers shall know something of the earnest plea that was made for the West, we give below a copy of the report. Although it failed of adoption, we regard the result as highly satisfactory, because it indicates the strong and growing sentiment of the church in favor of a long neglected field. A very prominent man remarked to us, "I voted against you, but I confess I did so with misgivings." Another said, "Well, Brother, this is the last time you will have to beg the church to help you." The time is at hand when the church will see that her servants who are assigned to difficult fields in the home as well as in the foreign fields, shall be provided for. But to

THE REPORT:

Your Committee, to whom was referred certain memorials concerning the needs of our Home Mission fields, beg leave to report:

The considerations which led to the establishment of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, on the Pacific Coast at the first still apply with undiminished force. Successive General Conferences have voiced the conviction of the great body of Southern Methodists on this subject and that vast field has been entered and occupied by us. For forty years our cause surviving the strain of the war and other tests has demonstrated the indestructive vitality of the principles for which it as stood and indicated its providential origin and purpose. In that field Soule and Andrew and Marvin and Pierce and Doggett and Wightman and Kavanaugh and McTyeire have labored, and all have agreed in the conviction that it was our duty to begin this work, and that we must maintain it. The sarifices have borne heavily upon many of the laborers in the field, but the duty laid upon them was imperative.

The results have justified the wisdom of the projectors of the work and attested the fidelity of the men who have represented us in the field.

A knowledge of the facts leaves no room to doubt that the work of our great Church is needed in the West and Northwest where sin, superstition and unbelief abound. To withdraw would be disaster to the cause of Christ, and would be both disgraceful and disastrous to us as a Church. We must maintain our border line, or surrender it. When we begin a backward movement, where will we stop?

Nothing is hazarded by the assertion that in porportion to the expenditure made, no Church on the Pacific Coast and in the Northwest has done more than ours. This being so, no further argument is needed as to the propriety of holding the ground we have gained and advancing our lines. We must recognize the fact that this is Missionary ground, as other churches do, and emulate them in the adoption of a more aggressive policy and a wise liberality, a liberality that is true economy because it will secure great results where meager and inadequate outlay is a waste of the Lord's money and a crucifixion of soul to the men in the gap who must retreat or perish, or live at a poor dying rate, which is death prolonged.

We yield to none in devotion to our Foreign Mission work. We would be glad if more could be done now for it. But we submit that the disparity between the support given to the home and foreign work is too great. The amount appropriated to our Western and Northwestern work is only 8 per cent of the whole amount recommended for that work and the foreign fields. In the face of such a fact, should it be a matter of wonder to anybody that our cause is hindered and our laborers plead for relief? Is it unreasonable that they should ask for a wiser and more equitable distribution of the common fund?

The whole amount to be appropriated for the present year is 259,576.00, of which it is proposed to appropriate $233,151.00 to the foreign work, and $26,425.00 to this Pacific Coast, West and the Northwest, which is our home mission field.

A larger appropriation is absolutely necessary to the support of the work in our home mission field. Under the rule adopted by this Board restricting the amount to be appropriated within the limits of that actually raised during the preceding year, we see but one expedient by which this increased appropriation can be secured, and that is by subtracting for this purpose a sufficient sum from the appropriations proposed for the foreign field. We therefore submit the following resolutions.

Resolved, That the sum of $10,000.00 be added to the appropriations recommended by the Committee on Estimates for the Denver, New Mexico, Los Angeles, Pacific, Columbia, East Columbia, Montana, and Western Conferences, to be distributed among said Conferences as follows: Los Angeles Conference, $2,000; Pacific Conference, $1,000; Western Conference, $500; Denver Conference, $1,500; New Mexico Conference, $1,500; Columbia Conference, $1,500; East Columbia Conference, $1,500; Montana Conference, $1,500.

Resolved, That the Committee on Estimates be, and are hereby directed to read just the schedule of appropriations so as to secure the result demanded by the foregoing resolution.

E. J. Stanley.

THIS AND THAT.

In a personal note to the editor, Rev. H. B. Terry says: "Several inspiring Lord's Day services have prepared me better for the "Advocate" news in regard to the Bishop and the time of holding the East Columbia Conference, which is too early for us entirely, especially this year. Besides, the estimates [appropriations are meant, we suppose.—Ed.] will be smaller [the same as last year, to the two Columbia Conferences.—Editor], notwithstanding the "battle of the giants." I see you were among them [yes, but not one of them.—Editor.] No doubt you were on the right side of the debate. [We surely thought so, though a majority of those voting, including our good Bishop, thought otherwise.—Editor.] However we shall do the best we can during the short time left us this conference year.

We had a good day at Oakesdale, Wash., where I received three members and baptized three children. Three more children were baptized at Rockford, Wash., on the first Sunday in May.

We acknowledge the receipt of a very kind and pressing invitation from Brother Swift, also from other brethren on the west side, to attend the district conference which is to be held at Genesee. We shall make an effort to go, but cannot make a positive promise at this time. It would afford us unbounded pleasure to be present on that occasion. We have also been pressed to go to the conference at Heppner, Ore. But that is entirely too far, though it would greatly rejoice us to be with our brethren and share the hospitality of Brothers Palmer and Kirk and scores of other good people there. Blessings on all of them.

Rev. Edwin Palmer sends the following stirring note from Heppner, Ore.

Our work grows at this place. Congregations good. Sunday School and Epworth League well attended. We are anticipating a great time at District Conference at Heppner, 1st of June. Let there be a full attendance. Let all come praying for a special outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

Brother J. H. Evans, a noble-hearted layman of Seney, Mo., who has been reading the Methodist for a year, though he never subscribed for it, sends $2 to pay for the paper in the past and for one year in advance, and the same amount for a neighbor, S. Milam, in like situation, and adds: "We like your paper. It is a grand little sheet. God bless you in your work and labor of love, and crown the labor of his servants with abundant success all over this land of ours and especially in the West."

We appreciate and reciprocate the kind words and earnest prayers of our brethren at Seney. There are many zealous soldiers of the cross whose names are unknown to the world, who are rendering just as valiant service to the cause of our Master by their prayers and their consecrated offerings as those who stand in the front of the battle, and their crowns will be just as bright in the grand review that is coming by and by.

We rejoice to receive such a cheering letter from Rev. P. M. Bell. In a private note he says of the "Methodist:" I love it more and more, and Mrs. Bell reads it first and enjoys it most. When the mail comes in she always asks, "Have you brought the "Montana?" as she calls it. The Sunday School lessons it contains are worth the price,—$1.

We trust that our brethren in East Columbia Conference as well as in Montana and other portions of the West will heed Brother W. B. Gray's exhortation to write oftener for the "Montana Methodist." There are hundreds, yea thousands, of people throughout the church who are waiting anxiously for the cheering messages it brings to their homes every week concerning our work in the West.

Brother D. W. Yoakum sends an encouraging note from Baker City. Results follow his labors when he is unencumbered in his work. As he truthfully says, man cannot quit the field and retain access to the fountain of living waters. The faithful preaching of the gospel brings a rich reward. If men reject it, then it returns to bless, enrich and ennoble the soul of the proclaimer. It always brings the fulfillment of the promise, "Lo, I am with you alway." We trust that our brother will continue to press the battle.

On our way through Montana, as we came home, we saw none of our preachers except Brother Glasgow, of Deer Lodge, whom we met on the platform at Garrison Junction. He is busily engaged "prospecting" in the regions round about, has established appointments at Garrison, Avon and Elliston, where he reports good congregations, and is enthusiastic over the outlook. We were never happier in our life than when engaged in just that kind of work—visiting the homes and preaching the gospel to those who would be deprived entirely of such means of grace were it not for our humble ministry. Let us not forget our marching orders, nor the example of our Lord.

There is to be a great International Epworth League Conference at Cleveland, Ohio, June 29, 30, and July 1 and 2. Headquarters for the same has been fixed at Hallenden Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio. It will doubtless be a grand affair. Those desiring accommodations in the way of entertainment should address the committee on entertainment at the above hotel. Those desiring reduced rates should make arrangements with local agents before starting.

Read Mr. Koch's notice about the meeting of the Montana State Sunday School Association at Deer Lodge, June 6-8, and make an effort to attend. We remember a very pleasant session of the convention which we attended several years ago at Deer Lodge. It is quite helpful to meet with brethren of other denominations and find out their methods of carrying forward the same great work in which we are all interested.

As will be seen, we give up the most of the space in this issue to our correspondents, from whom we are delighted to hear. We hope next week to give some attention to our exchanges, which we have scarcely had time to look over since we returned home.

Pleae make it a point to call attention to the Montana Methodist before your congregations next Sunday, and mention it in the homes that you visit, and send us some new names right away. It is YOUR paper as much as ours, and you have promised to work for it. Brother, we mean YOU.

MONTANA STATE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

Bozeman, Montana,
May 1, 1893.

The Fourth annual convention of the Montana State Sunday School Association will be held in the Presbyterian Church at Deer Lodge June 6, 7, and 8, 1893, and every effort is being made to secure a pleasant and profitable gathering. A carefully arranged program is being prepared, and the best possible speakers will be secured.

Each school in the State is entitled to two delegates, and each organized County to two delegates from the County Association.

Entertainment will be provided by the citizens of Deer Lodge.

This is the only strictly interdenominational gathering held in the state. Let every school plan to be represented, and let the delegates come prepared to take part in the discussions.

PETER KOCH,
Chairman Executive Com.

THE SPOKANE DISTRICT CONFERENCE.

The Spokane District Conference will meet in Genesee, Idaho, Thursday, at 9 A. M., June 15th, and continue over the following Sunday. The opening sermon will be preached on Wednesday evening, June 14th, by Rev. J. W. Craig.

Pastors will please bring their Quarterly Conference Records. Let us not forget our motto in regard to reports: "Facts, in accurate figures."

The Sunday School Conference will be held on Saturday, the 17th. Programme announced later.

Religion.

Must be everything, or it is of little value. Out and out for God. In and in for salvation, through and through, from head to foot, all the time, day in and day out, year after year, up to and and ever after death, is the only kind that will answer. Simon pure, Holy Ghost religion must take ALL. Any kind that only pays for, and takes part, is of no good, not for this life, much less for the life to come. The profession of religion so much in vogue, is empty air, unsatisfactory in every respect. Signing cards, subscribing to creeds, uniting with the church, observing the forms, doing works, are only the outward, the veneer, the whitewash, the show; not the real, the substance, the true. Holy Ghost religion is the only kind that is adapted and adequate to meet every want, of every kind, of every man, woman, child. Holy Ghost religion from the start to the finish, from beginning to end.

THE CREATOR REMEMBERED.

LESSON TEXT.—Eccl. 12:1-7,13,14.

TEACHING HINTS.

BY A. F. SCHAUFFLER, D. D.

If Solomon had only lived as beautifully as he wrote, his would have been an almost perfect life. So, if we lived more nearly as we pray, our lives would be less full of failure. Our lesson to-day is a beautiful piece of prose-poetry. Call the attention of the scholars to the poetical figures used. The major part of the lesson is a description of the feebleness of old age. But it will apply as well to those days of weakness and pain which often precede death, even in the case of the young.

Old age takes but little pleasure in life; appetite gone, joys palled, strength decayed, hopes blasted (v. 1). Eyes feeble, sight impaired, recovery postponed (v. 2). Arms, hands, limbs, feeble, and strength tremulous; teeth decayed, eyes dimmed (v. 3). Loss of sight, of hearing, of smell, of speech, of touch (eye gate, ear gate, nose gate, mouth gate, touch gate, all swing heavily;) sleep fitful and unrestful; music no longer attractive (v. 4). Timidity increased; fears on every hand; weakness so great that even a grasshopper becomes too heavy to carry; desires faded (v. 5). The silver thread of life snapped, the golden bowl of life broken, and the life is spilled; the pitcher with the water of life dashed in pieces; the wheel that brings up the cool draught wrecked (v. 6.) Such are the poetic figures by which the wise man sets forth the weakness incident to the failure of life's vital forces. How true and life-like the picture, witness every aged grandfather and every invalid character.

In view of all this, the wise Preacher takes a text and preaches from the word "remember." Remember what? Remember God. Ask now three questions.

Question 1: Why should we remember God? Because he is our Creator. This reason is enough. If I am the work of his hands, I surely owe him my allegiance. I am not in any sense independent, but wholly dependent upon him. From him I received my life, and all my powers of body, mind, and soul; and he it is who has sustained them until this day. Why, then, should I ever forget him? Since he has ever remembered me, and kept me, and blessed me, I should remember him by day and night. Again, I should remember him because he stands ready to be my Redeemer. Created by God, lost by sin, redeemed by grace,—this is the history of every one of God's own children. If I forget him as my Redeemer, I shall by him be forgotten in the hour of my greatest need. As Redeemer he offers to pardon my past and to bless my future with unspeakable glory. All heaven is open to those who remember their Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel. If love should awaken grateful remembrance, then surely my memory should be active; for the love of Christ to me passeth knowledge. For "while we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly." "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and gave himself for us." Again, I should remember him because he is to be my judge. All who forget God will be punished by him, because they thus reject his love, shown to them in the sacrifice of his Son for their salvation. We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; for it is appointed unto man once to die, but after that the judgment. If I want it to go well with me in that day, when the records of all hearts are to be revealed, I must remember him before it is too late.

Question 2: How shall I remember him as my Creator and Benefactor, it will awaken feelings of gratitude in my heart. I shall feel like saying, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits." If I remember him as my Judge, my sins will begin to array themselves against me. I shall see their magnitude and their multitude. This will alarm me. My false peace will be broken up, and I shall begin to say, "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving-kindness; according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions." When men forget their Judge, they also forget their guilt; when they remember their Judge, their sin is ever before them. This will lead them to remember that he is also their Redeemer. To him they will then flee from the wrath to come. If I at all realize that judgment is ahead, I shall flee for refuge to Him who alone can give it. The cry, "What must I do to be saved?" will burst from my lips, and I shall then take Jesus as my redeemer and friend. In this way I shall rightly "remember."

Question 3: When should I remember God? Now, before evil days of old age or of youthful disease come, when body and mind will not be in a fit state to remember anything but my pain. The writer was once called to see a strange young woman on her bed of pain. "Shall I talk to you about religious truth?" said he. "How can I listen," was the reply, "when my body is so full of pain? Come again to-morrow." On the morrow I went again; but the silver cord had already been loosed, and the golden bowl been broken, and the spirit had gone to its Judge. Too late! Remember God now, because now is the only time of which you are sure. Yesterday is gone; to-morrow may never come. To-day alone is yours. If you want to be sure of heaven, this is your chance. Satan says "to-morrow;" God says "to-day." Which one will you believe? Remember God now, because your heart grows harder every day, and the habits of sin become stronger with the passing weeks. To repent in old age is much harder than to repent in youth.

One more question. Why should you not remember God now? Ask the class for one good reason, only just one, that should lead us to put off this duty and privilege. Go all around the class, one by one, and ask for one reason that will stand the test of the judgment day. Not a scholar will dare plead one such reason. There are no good reasons for delay. Call out, then, the bad reasons, if possible, and see if this may not shock the scholars into solemnity. Years ago I asked a godless man outside of my church door, on a Sunday evening in December, to come in "now." He said, "I will come in at New Year's Day, and turn over a new leaf then." Years have passed, but his promise is yet unfulfilled, and he never comes even to the door of the church now.

Some Practical Thoughts.

A gentleman of high respectability and a member of the church, made this remark the other day, when informed that an application was about to be made to him in behalf of some charitable object. "I have done giving," said he. The remark awakened the following train of thought:

"Done giving!" Has he, indeed? Why, has he given all? Has he nothing left to give? Has this desciple done what his Master did? Was he rich, and has he become poor for the sake of others, that they, through his poverty, might be rich? O, no; abundance still. He has not only not impoverished himself, but is probably richer now, through the favor of Providence, than he would have been had he never given anything. Now, if by honoring the Lord with his substance, his barns, instead of being emptied, have been filled with plenty, he had better continue this mode of increasing his worldly goods, and rather enlarge than arrest his liberality.

"Done giving!" Why? Is there no more need of giving? Is the world evangelized and furnished with the means of grace? Have missionaries visited every shore? Is the Bible translated into every language, and distributed in every land, a copy in every family, and every member of every family taught to read it? Have the poor ceased from the land? O, no; there are no such good reasons as these for ceasing to give. Why, then, has he done giving? Is it because others do not give as they ought? But what is that to him? Will he make the practice of others his rule of conduct, rather than the precept of Jesus Christ? If others do not give so much the more should he. Will he add another name to the list of niggards?

Does he feel worse for having given away so much? Has it made him unhappy? Is his experience different from that of the Lord Jesus, who said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive?"

"Done giving!"—that is, done lending to the Lord. Done sowing and watering. Done offering the sacrifice with which God is well pleased. Done making the widow's heart leap for joy, and bringing upon himself the blessing of them that were ready to perish. Well, I am sorry—sorry for the sake of the poor and the ignorant and the heathen. But no less sorry am I for the man's own sake. Poor man—poor with all his wealth: for there is no one poorer than he who, with the ability to give, has not the inclination. He has it in his power to give, but not in his heart. Poor man!

"Done giving!" Well, then, if he will not give his money, he must keep it. And yet, how short the time he can keep it! Would it not be better to freely give away some of it, than to wait for it all to be torn from him? The thought that he has given will be at least as agreeable a meditation in his dying moments as the reflection that he spent, or that he laid up.

I hope that gentleman who said, "I have done giving," will recall his resolution, and take revenge on himself for having made it, by giving more liberally than ever.

THREE GATES.

BY BETH DAY.

If you are tempted to reveal
A tale someone to you has told
About another, make it pass,
Before you speak, three gates of gold.

These narrow gates—First, "Is it true?"
Then, "Is it needful?" In your mind
Give truthful answer. And the next
Is last and narrowest, "Is it kind?"

And if to reach your lips at last
It passes through these gateways three,
Then you may tell the tale, nor fear
What the result of speech may be.

FROM BAKER CITY, ORE.

Dear Brother Stanley:— Enclosed find one dollar to renew my subscription. Could you not show on the label the date of expiration of the subscription? [We would gladly do this, but it is not practicable, as we are now situated. —Editor.] As to my work, I did not get actively into the field before December, for reasons known to my brethren here, and thus lost much precious time. Things have moved quite agreeably since I began labor. I have been well pleased over my charge and it seems to be mutual. I preached longer and harder, and with more power on my heart during the winter than ever in my life before, with scarcely any visible results. But the effects were peace and righteousness to me and humble acknowledgments from many that God stirred them and made their foundations of sand to quiver. I love the gospel. It is a safeguard against despair and a fountain of joy. When called to preach, man cannot quit the field and retain the fountain of living water. In God only are all our springs.

I ride on horseback 55 miles to my appointment. We have no parsonage on the work, but a most beautiful church now about to be painted. The Oregon work is decidedly increasing. Let me congratulate you that you have my noble friend, M. H. Kauffman, from Mo., with you at Belgrade, Montana. Come over to District Conference.

FROM RINARD, ILL.

Dear Bro. Stanley:—I have just received the Montana Methodist of April 21st, and oh, what sweet recollections it brings to mind as I read of the work in the great Northwest. We are here that my wife who has been poorly for over a year may receive treatment. She is not much better yet. We are glad to read of the good revival held in Palouse, Wash., which was our old home. May the Lord continue to bless Brother Compton and his work. We will continue to pray for the work in the mountains. Brethren in the Spokane District, East Columbia Conference, write more to the Montana Methodist. I for one love to hear from home. Pray for us in our affliction. Enclosed find one dollar on our subscription to the "Methodist."

None are lost if they do not give themselves up for lost, and so are discouraged from repentance.

ALONG THE LINE

FROM ISLAND CITY, OREGON.

Dear Bro. Stanley: It has been quite a while since I wrote anything for the Methodist, for I don't believe in writing unless you have something to say. Well, the storm has somewhat abated and the dark clouds that have hung over my work for some months are disappearing, and the light of God's presence and power is shining brightly. We have passed through a very severe trial, but God has sustained us by his grace, and the old ship so wildly tossed and so nearly driven against the rocks is now sailing in the "open sea" surrounded by God's care, so that the storm has given place to a calm. Last Sunday[May7th] was our third quarterly meeting,and a glorious time it was. Our Presiding Elder preached in "demonstration of the Spirit and of power." It was a feast of fat things for the soul. At the close of the sermon an invitation was given for persons to join the church, and two came forward; they are the last of a whole family of seven. One had been a member of the church before and is the wife of our S. S. Supt., the other, her brother-in-law, has been under conviction for several months and has just yielded. After the congregation was dismissed I spoke to a young man who I knew was under conviction and he broke down and asked to be received then; so we called the congregation together and received him into the church. We have a very fine company of young people, most of them converted and received this year. They are taking hold of the work with an earnestness I have not seen before in the Northwest. At night we organized an Epworth League that starts off with great promise; membership 17. We have ordered programmes for "Children's Day," and expect to have the exercises the second Sunday in June. The League will have it under care.

Our finances are somewhat behind, but I think will improve now. The Lord has wonderfully blessed us this year, and our members, with several exceptions, have heartily co-operated with us. Plans have been sent for, and soon the building of the church in La Grande will be begun and pushed forward. We have a solid body of safe, conservative men on the Building Committee. I think the house will be ready for dedication by Conference.

May the Lord continue to bless you, Mr. Editor, in your work. Of course we shall expect you at our District Conference to be held at Heppner, June 1st. Come.

—P. M. Bell.

FROM WESTON, ORE.

We are still moving with the current, whose velocity is increased by the prospects of a new State Normal School building, improved water system and electric lights. All branches of business are looking up. The crop prospects are good, and people generally in good spirits. Our third Quarterly Conference was a success. Our little man with the big, historic name is full weight as a Presiding Elder. As a preacher he is a "workman that needeth not to be ashamed." But anyhow he holds the strings. [Just what we need.] We are preparing for a general Temperance rally on the 6-7 of June, when we hope to organize a Good Templers Lodge here. Our Sunday-school is holding up well. Our prayer service is good. Our good sisters now have a woman's prayer meeting weekly and a monthly Gospel sociable, both of which will, we trust, be conducive of good. We have had five additions to our church since my last quarterly report, and others in sight. We hope to make a good showing for our part of the field and leave a good field for some good pastor. Our people here are loyal as can be and true as steel, ready to do their duty on all lines of church work. If the grain crop is good we will come up to our assessments. Pray for us.

THE HISTORY OF DANIEL CONTINUED.

Daniel, the Hebrew captive, has a most wonderful history. In a former article the reader has the benefits of the first part of this history. The latter part is here given, as the more thrilling and instructive. Daniel was a good man, a model citizen, and without blemish as a civil officer. In making this statement, charge me not with exaggeration,fulsome praise, or willful misrepresentation of the facts. Let any doubting Thomas read the history for himself. Daniel had understanding and wisdom above his fellows, superior gifts and graces, and moreover, there was found in him an excellent spirit as a ruler in the kingdom. For these reasons Daniel had preferment with the king and stood at the head of all the great men of the empire. There is always room at the top, and this is the class of men who get there to stay. There is no power to hold them back, to shade their glory, or to despoil them of meritod fame. The attempt was made on Daniel, but was a failure. All such attempts in the past have been fruitless. In the end truth and right will prevail. Let aspiring young men note these facts and govern themselves accordingly.

The other great men of the kingdom hated and persecuted Daniel. They were envious and jealous of his preferment. This was not merely a surprising weakness, but a crime in them. They first sought occasion against him concerning the kingdom. "But they could find none occasion nor fault, for as much as he was faithful, neither was there any error nor fault found in him." In his loyalty and official duty to the king, he is faithful; no error, no crime, no misdemeanor. "Then said these men, we shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God. After the most diligent search along this line, they find nothing in him worthy either of bonds or death. What are these men to do? Their object is to destroy Daniel, and they will not stop short of this malicious purpose. To this end they frame an edict, "that whosoever shall ask a petition of any God or man for thirty days, save of thee, O King, he shall be cast into the den of lions." This writing flattered the king and not even suspecting the ultimate design, he signed it. It is now a royal statute that cannot be changed. Daniel's doom is sealed and his enemies are jubilant over their success.

No man can serve two masters, and Daniel has the alternative now, either to serve God or man. He seems not to have hesitated for a moment; but stood firmly and from principle, to his convictions of right and duty. As a foretime, he continued to pray to God. In this loyalty to God, he is made to rebel against the king's commandment. For his rebellion he knew full well that he would be cast into the den of lions; but he preferred innocence in the sight of God to the king's favor. This was a wise choice as the sequel shows, and is a safe and worthy example to all good men under like circumstances. He did not hide or shirk or skulk away, as many do to avoid the penalty of the violated law. But gave himself into the hands of the proper officers, and was cast into the den of lions, whose mouths were locked by an angel so that they hurt him not. So much for fidelity to God, and to principle, and to conscience and the right. The divine approval and protection are absolutely certain to those whose trust is in God, and who maintain their integrity in the faithful performance of duty. On the other hand, the disobedient and rebellious are destroyed by their own wickedness. Certain, and sometimes sudden, destruction comes upon them, as in the case of Daniel's persecutors. At the king's command they were brought and cast into this same den of lions, and were devoured ere they reached the bottom of the pit.

It is never safe to fight against God, against moral principles, or against the religious interests and duties of a fellow citizen. Wicked men would do well to remember that their sins are sure to find them out; and that the wages of sin is death. This is just as true as that the sun rises and sets. And this is the sum of the lessons taught in the history of Daniel. No virtue goes unrewarded, and no vice ever goes unpunished.

—S. W. Cope.
